SIGURD

A POEM

By ARTHUR PETERSON

P$3531 .F 84

Copyright, 1910, by ARTHUR PETERSON amp27 M234

A State State

Note

the best-known versions are probably the old Nibelungenlied, and Wagner's famous tetralogy Der Ring des Nibelungen), has been told by so many people, and in such a variety of ways, that no excuse is offered by the writer for adding one more variation to the collection. In the following poem the hero is depicted as a young Norse rover, a wanderer not only by land but by sea, this latter innovation seeming to lend itself quite naturally to the established legend. The action is supposed to take place about the middle of the fifth century, that eventful period which may be said to mark the end of the ancient, and the beginning of the modern, world.

The story of Sigurd, like most legendary stories, was probably based upon an actual historic occurrence; but when, where, or by whom the tale was first put together no one knows. It is found in the literature of all the Germanic peoples; and it was an especial favorite among the Norse races who, after the withdrawal of the Roman garrisons, settled in such preponderating numbers in Britain. It is natural, therefore, that it should be popular among the descendants of those races—the English-speaking peoples of to-day.

6 NOTE

The best blood of Norway, Sweden and Denmark (or what is commonly known as Scandinavia), seems to have passed over into the British Isles during the long period of colonization (about 600 years) between the fifth and the eleventh centuries; not only by direct migration and settlement, but by the indirect route of Normandy; for William the Conqueror and his Normans, though they had French names, were probably in lineage at least half Norse. By the best blood I mean not so much the best conducted and most peaceable persons, as the most energetic, aggressive, daring and adventurous. And there is little doubt that it is to the descendants of these restless, seafaring spirits that Great Britain owes her centuries of maritime supremacy and over-sea colonization. The English adventurers of the sixteenth and eighteenth centuries were but repeating, on a larger scale, the exploits of their ancestors of a thousand years before; and the long line of ocean-heroes, in which Drake and Nelson are perhaps the most conspicuous figures, had its beginning in the bold Norse rovers who, while England was yet in the making, sailed forth upon "the swan's road." This idea is touched upon in the chapter entitled "Erda's Prophecy."

The Burgundians, with whom the fortunes of Sigurd become so closely connected, and among whom he finally meets his death, were a Teutonic people whose former home had been the country between the Oder and the Vistula. They migrated toward the west and south, and at the time of our story were settled in the valley of the upper Rhine, in the neighborhood of Worms. The Burgundians afterward passed over into Gaul, and the territory occupied by them ultimately became part of the celebrated Duchy of Burgundy.

NOTE 7

The Latin form Scandia has been used throughout the poem in preference to the commoner word Scandinavia, it being better suited to metrical composition.

Contents

	Prelude	•	•	•		II
I.	GUDRUN'S DREAM .				•	13
II.	THE COMING OF SIGUR	D.			•	16
III.	THE BANQUET (Include	ing S	igurd'	s Nai	rative)				•	23
IV.	THE TOURNAMENT		•	•	•	78
V.	SIGURD AND GUDRUN		•		•	86
VI.	In the Odenwald		•	•	•	94
VII.	THE VALKYR	•	•			99
VIII.	SIGURD AND GUNTER	•	•	•	•	110
IX.	YULE-TIDE AT THE CO	URT C	of Ki	ng G	UN-
	TER (Including the	Song	g of (Olaf	the
	Red)	•	•	•	•	114
X.	In the Garden .			•	•	139
XI.	GUNTER'S SOLILOQUY	•	:	•	•	145
XII.	HAGEN AND GISELHER		•	•	•	147
XIII.	Hagen's Soliloguy		•	•		152
XIV.	ERDA'S PROPHECY .	•		•	•	154
XV.	THE DEATH OF SIGURI			•	•	164
XVI.	BESIDE THE RHINE.		•	•		178

PRELUDE

Ί

Sigurd I sing, a son of that dark north,
Of that wild Scandian mother-land whence sprang
The sea-tost hosts who, in that long ago,
The bases of imperial England laid:—
Such as were they, he was—one of that race
Which ever loved to ride the restless waves,
Or in gray Scandia, its ancestral home,
Dwelling, or in the Isles of Britain, where
Later it throve: men with the eagle's heart,
Storm-nurtured, calm amid the swirling seas,
Wanderers upon the deep until this day.
Sigurd—his birth, his life, his death, I sing.

II

And Thou, O Muse, without whose aid divine My lips, however willing, must be mute, Thee I beseech my numbers to inspire.

Come Goddess now: I reverently attend.

GUDRUN'S DREAM

Ī

The fair Gudrun, in her bower beside the Rhine, On three successive nights had dreamed a dream, Piteous, distressful; and to Ursula, Her mother, good King Dancrat's widowed queen, She thus, with tears, unburdened her full heart.

II

"Dear mother, whilst I slept within my bower,
On three successive nights to me hath come
A dream whereof the meaning I know not,
Piteous, distressful; for methought I loved
A white gyrfalcon, more than aught else seemed,
In the whole world, this gallant bird to me,
With eyes so bright, and plumage like the snow.
He from his home in the far north had flown
Southward to Burgundy; I myself had tamed
His wandering spirit, and upon my hand
Content he sat whene'er I rode afield,

What time the hern we hunted with our hawks.
But one thrice-sorrowful day, as into air
Swiftly he rose, sighting his quarry, lo!
Two eagles fierce, wheeling from out the hills
In circles vast, inexorable, grim,
Beset and slew him; and methought my grief
Was like the grief of her who loses all—
Or what seems all when Death hath struck his blow—
The wife her husband or the mother her child."

III

Then spoke Queen Ursula: solicitude

Dwelt in her voice, disquiet in her mien:

"Oft in our dreams the future lives, and thus,

My daughter, do I read thy vision wild.

Perchance I read it wrong; but, as thou know'st,

At Yule-tide was I born, the seventh child

Of seventh child, and second-sight is mine—

A power clairvoyant granted by the gods.

This, then, the interpretation of thy dream:

The white gyrfalcon is a noble youth

Whom thou wilt learn to love with all thy soul.

The eagles fierce two cruel warriors are

Whose spears shall slay thy lord. Alas, Gudrun!

Methinks that by the hand of Skuld herself,

Who sits beside the ash-tree Ygdrasil
Gazing upon the future, was dispatched
This vision, in whose happenings I discern
The dread announcement of a deed to come.
Ruth hath my mother's heart for thee, Gudrun;
Thy falcon falls before the eagles twain.
O woeful hour! As swift-descending storm
Darkens the day, so shall this murder foul
Becloud the sunny springtime of thy life.
Thy lord lies still in death. So speak the Norns!"

IV

Thus Ursula: and by her mother's words O'ercome, upon an ancient couch near by, Like broken lily, sank the fair Gudrun.

II

THE COMING OF SIGURD

I

Gunter, the king of the Burgundians, gave A mighty feast, to celebrate that day, Seven years before, whereon his reign began. For when his father, old King Dancrat, died, Leaving, besides a widowed queen, three sons, Gunter and Giselher and Gernot bold, And one fair maid, the flower of the land, Gudrun, Gunter, the eldest, was proclaimed the king. And throve his kingdom. For a respite brief From battle left men time for kindlier deeds. And woods were felled; and fields of waving grain Covered the land; and towns sprang up anew; And trade with Rome, increasing, filled the realm With Roman gold, and brought to wondering eyes The silks and jewels of the mystic East. So in his palace by the Rhine, where dwelt A Roman pretor once, King Gunter bade Prepare this banquet, to commemorate The day his hand first grasped the helm of state.

H

That time in summer was it when the days
Longest and loveliest are, when leafy June
Mantles the earth, and Gunter's capital
(Called by the Romans Borbetomagus,
And by the men of later centuries Worms)
Sat, like a beauteous bride, beside the Rhine.

III

Now on the morning of the festive day, While yet the summer sun was low in the east, Appeared far down the Rhine, but moving up Against the stream, their sails filled by the breeze, Three galleys. Them a watchman from his tower Descried, and to King Gunter brought the word. Whence came they no man knew. And now the wind Carries them nearer, and the morning sun Blazons each carven, golden-headed prow, And gaily-broidered sail. And lo! within, Sitting upon the rowers' benches some, And others grouped on forecastle and poop, The bold and brawny crews of mail-clad men, Sons of the ocean, with their red shields hung Outboard along the gunwales. And to eyes That watched the scene the foremost galley looked

A mighty dragon, breasting Rhine's broad flood. For her high-arching prow was shaped and carved Like dragon's front, with gilded crest upreared Above the wave; and all along each side The warriors' shields like dragon's scales appeared; And, looking aft, the high and curling stern Ended a dragon's gilded tail in air. And of her sister ships a great wolf's head Carved out of wood, with grim wide-open jaws, One bore upon her bow, the other a bear's, Both fancifully gilded. In this wise, A gallant sight, were built these galleys three.

IV

Then said King Gunter: "Let my men-at-arms Be ready, but no hostile act disclose.

Or friend or foe I know not, but methinks

Peace and not war is in the stranger's heart."

V

Now toward the river's bank each galley turns, And soon the sails are lowered, and in a cove Near by the vessels rest; and from the side Of one, the largest galley of the three, Whose prow a gilded dragon's front displayed, Is thrown a gangplank to the river shore; And over this, forthwith, a figure steps —
Tall—straight—with wingèd helm and byrnie bright —

And after him a score of viking forms, With spear in hand and shield on arm, and toward The palace of the king all take their way.

VI

Now when the strangers to that spot had come Where Gunter stood, flanked by his men-at-arms, They halted, and one lifted high in air A snow-white shield, as if to signal Peace. And he who seemed the leader—by his dress, And face and noble bearing—left his men, And toward King Gunter slowly strode alone. And Gunter, reading in the stranger's mien A brother ruler—whether great or small He knew not, still a leader among men—Stepped likewise from his soldiery apart, And toward that other slowly strode alone. And in mid-field the two, unguarded, met.

VII

Spoke then the stranger, courteous his salute; "Art thou King Gunter, ruler of this realm?"
And Gunter answered: "Aye." That other then:

"My name is Sigurd, from that far northland, Scandia yclept by men of Roman tongue, I come, with these three galleys which thou seest In yonder cove, and mariners six score; All hardy Norsemen, nurtured by the sea, Rough foster-mother, from their earliest days. Wanderers are we, our ships our homes, our trade To pull the oar, to steer, to set the sail, And, when occasion calls, to draw the sword, For like the eagle's are our lives, O King! But not in quest of booty do I come To-day, nor on adventures warlike cruise, But rather to fulfil a project dear, Born of the wandering instinct in my heart, And grown now to a purpose of my life O'ermastering:—To behold, ere youth and strength Depart, and old age mark me for the grave, The mighty world; to see with mine own eyes Rome, and the wondrous East, and what beyond Lies, if in truth there lies a land beyond, Or holy Asgard, as our sagas teach. And up this noble river have I sailed These many days, and feasted on its charms, Pursuant to this purpose of my heart. Friends are we then, O King, and friendship crave

From thee. But if some wild adventure wait,
Or thou hast present need of gallant men
For war, which oft comes when expected least,
Command my sword. These be all vikings bold,
Stout sea-dogs every one, who know not fear,
But love to breast the buffets of the storm
When blows the dark northeaster o'er the wave;
And love still more, while valkyrs o'er them fly,
To front the battle's furious stress; to hear
The battle's music;—the clash of sword against sword,
The shock of axe on helm, the pit-a-pat
Of the arrows' hail upon the shield. True sons
Of Odin and of Thor be these, O King;
And what I bid them do they'll do—or die."

VIII

He ceased, and Gunter thus to him replied "Welcome, brave knight, to the Burgundian land! No wars have I at present, though a bold Adventure long hath occupied my dreams, (Of which hereafter will I speak to thee) Wherein thy eager spirit, and the skill Of these stout mariners would aid me much. But for to-day let's have no more of war, But wassail only. In the banquet hall

Of yonder palace is a feast prepared.

Be thou my guest, brave knight. And as for these,
Thy merry men, they're welcome one and all.

And to their comrades, who in yonder cove
Remain, on board thy sea-tost ships, I'll send Cattle and sheep and ale and whate'er else
Is found upon the tables in the hall,
That all may join in our festivities.

For on this day, seven years ago, my reign
Began; and I to-day would celebrate
Fitly, and as becomes a king, the event."

IX

He ceased: the two clasped hands: and Sigurd thus, With all his men, became King Gunter's guests.

Ш

THE BANQUET

(Including Sigurd's Narrative)

Ţ

The feast is on in Gunter's banquet hall,
And up and down the vast interior
(A parallelogram in shape, whose length
Extends three times its breadth) reigns, everywhere,
The merry wassail of the olden time.

H

Upraised upon a dais, at one end
Of the great hall, the table of the king
Athwart-ships ran, stretching from side to side.
Here sat, apart from the wild feast below,
Yet of it; seeing all, by all beheld;
Gunter, his household and his guests of rank:—
Ursula, his mother, the queen dowager;
The fair Gudrun, his sister golden-haired,
And many a lovely damsel of the bower;
Gernot and Giselher, his brothers twain;
Hagen, the captain of his men-at-arms;

And others, kin or in authority:
And here, the guest of honor, seen of all,
Upon the king's right hand Earl Sigurd sat.

III

Beginning at the dais' central step,
Set at right angles to the royal board,
A mighty table ran the whole hall's length,
(Ran fore-and-aft, to use a sailor's phrase)
And here were Gunter's men-at-arms, and here—
Each one between two spearmen, that the guest
Might want for nothing—Sigurd's vikings sat.

IV

And lackeys, low beneath their heavy loads
Bending, brought in the wild boar barbequed,
And quarter-beeves, and giant platters filled
With flesh of deer and sheep, and sucking pigs
Tender and savory, and great loaves of bread,
And wild-fowl grilled and served on wooden spits,
And huge squab-pies, and fish from out the Rhine,
And fruit and honey from Burgundian farms.
And round and round the mighty drinking-horns
Passed with the nut-brown ale or sparkling mead,
Passed, with their precious freight, from lip to lip,

Ever to be replenished and repass. Filled from great casks within the cellar stored. And Norseman and Burgundian drank "Was-hael" Each to the other, and ere the bearded lips Were dry, "Skoel to the viking," and again "Prosit," and mellow friendship ruled the hour, For Bacchus doth make brothers of us all. And ever and anon the harpers sang Their songs of battle, and the loud applause Of hands and voice the approbation marked Of warriors who themselves had fought the fight. Sailors their yarns did spin, and soldiers too, Each vying with the other, and merrily wagged The yellow beards as in Valhalla, when With Odin and with Thor the heroes feast. And fiercer harped the scald, and louder rose The laughter and the Bacchanalian song, Till revel inextinguishable filled The spacious hall, while waxed the summer night To midnight, and then waned into the dawn.

V

Meanwhile, upon the dais, gentler scenes Were passing; gentler themes engaged the tongue; As ever must it be when ladies sit Brave knights among, and lend to banquet hall
The sweet restraint of their companionship.
And when the meats were ended, and the sweets
Circled the board, and gay contentment reigned,
King Gunter bade his foremost serving-man
Each golden goblet fill with Roman wine,
And then, toward Sigurd looking, slowly spoke:

VI

"On this, the anniversary of that day, Seven years ago, whereon my reign began, A noble guest, from the far distant north, By gales auspicious wafted to these shores, Sits with us at our banquet table. Him My heart doth much delight to honor. Him I ask you all to welcome as my friend. Fierce battles hath he fought, weird perils faced— Faced and o'ercome. And if, to-night, perchance, Patience he hath to tell us of his life. And all its strange adventures manifold, An audience willing hath he at this board. But if the toils of travel him have left Wearied, and for long speech yet disinclined, Some other time, more opportune, we'll hope His wanderer's tale to hear. Meanwhile a cup

Of good red wine (wine by my grandsire brought From mighty Rome, made on the rocky hills Of fair Chianti, precious beyond compare)

Let's drink with him—a pledge of friendship true—

Trusting that long our honored guest he'll be.

Was-hael, Earl Sigurd! Gunter thee salutes,

And welcomes thee to Burgundy! Was-hael!"

VII

So speaking, to his bearded lips he raised
The golden cup, studded with precious stones,
Which stood beside his plate—now to the brim
Filled with the rosy wine of Italy.
And all who round the royal table sat,
Fair women and brave men, with one accord,
Joined in the monarch's greeting to his guest,
Crying "Was-hael! Earl Sigurd!" while in cups
Of rosy wine friendship to him they pledged.

VIII

Then Sigurd, rising to his feet, thus spoke:
"King Gunter, ladies, knights—for these kind words,
This royal welcome, let me thank you all.
Friends may I call you, for I feel that friends
We are and shall be. Little did I think,
This summer morn, as up you noble stream

I steered, with vessels three, on wanderings bent, That I such courteous words, such kindly hearts. Such regal hospitality should meet. Surely no ladies fairer, knights more brave. Walk the green earth than those of Burgundy. Surely no land—not even my northland—spreads More beautiful beneath its azure skies Than Burgundy. Surely no country boasts A nobler king than thou art, Gunter, King Of the Burgundians. And since thou, to-night, Hast honored me by asking of my life, Its wild beginnings and adventures weird, Right gladly will I speak, and briefly tell My tale. But first to thee and to thy house Friendship and fealty, in this good red wine, I fain would pledge. And may the gracious bond Never be broken, wheresoe'er I roam!"

IX

He lifted high in air his golden cup
And cried "The King!" And thereupon uprose
All that bright company of knights, and stood
With golden goblets lifted high in air,
And cried "The King!" And dames and damsels fair

Echoed, with voices sweet, the loyal toast,
Crying "The King!" And o'er the oaken board
The golden goblets, thus upheld in air,
Each near the other, formed a bright ellipse,
A glittering aureole crowning the fair feast.
Beautiful was the scene! And when the toast
In good Chianti had been drunk, and the knights
Once more had ta'en their seats, and silence fell,
Sigurd began the story of his life.

SIGURD'S NARRATIVE

T

In the far northland was I born, O king!
That land of the long winter night! That land
Where scarce sets the midsummer sun! That land
Of mountains and blue water, where the fiords
Of ocean with the forests intertwine.
Sigmund my father, and my mother sweet
Siglinda. In Valhalla rest their souls.

Π

A noble king my father, Sigmund, was;
Bright, puissant, the brave son of a great sire—
Volsung, a name renowned throughout the north.
But e'en the bravest, when his hour hath come,
Must die, for who can strive against the Norns;
And by the hand of Hunding, son of Raud,
A king cold-hearted, evil-minded, base,
Was slain my father. So the grisly night,
Suddenly swooping, doth blot out the sun.
And by the hands of Hunding's warriors fell

All but a remnant of my father's men —
True-hearted vikings, but the fight was vain.
And harried was the land, and cruel spears
Reddened with innocent blood the mountain stream,
And flames devoured the hamlet, and afar
To other countries fled those who escaped,
Till in my father's land, at last, there seemed Naught living but the vulture and the wolf.

Ш

Now deep within the forest hidden—so deep
That Hunding's spears ne'er found his habitat—
There dwelt an aged man, Regin by name.
Him oft my father's hand had guarded, him
My mother had befriended oft. A smith
Wondrous was he; and swords and spears and shields,

And byrnies bright, and battle-axes keen, He fashioned; and my father prized his skill Above that of all other smiths, and praised The strength and beauty of his handiwork. Ancient he was, none knew his years, no kin He seemed to have; but rumor said his race Was long extinct, he only had survived, Carrying his knowledge down the centuries.

A creature of a different age he seemed. Belonging to the long-forgotten Past. Him did my mother, in that bitter hour When Hunding's hate had robbed her of her lord. Remember; (as the hunted deer recalls A refuge) and to his wild forest forge, With me, a boy of scarce seven years, she fled. And thither faithful henchmen brought, by night. My father's body and his broken sword — Gram, whom the hand of Odin once had grasped. And for a little space my mother lived. But as some gentle plant, to alien soil Transferred, droops slowly to its death, so drooped My mother, and did slowly waste away; Till came a time when her the woodland wild Beheld no more, and in that world above Her gentle spirit did rejoin its mate.

IV

And Regin took the boy, myself, and taught—
Or strove to teach—his crescent spirit all
The secrets of the smith's time-honored craft.
How from the primal ore to summon forth—
Led by his master-hand through changing shapes—
Those objects bright and beautiful and strong

Born of the hammer and the anvil. How
To forge the spear's head and the arrow's point,
To fabricate the hauberk and the helm,
To temper the bright sword, of weapons king,
Till like Thor's lightning-bolt, swift, terrible,
'Twould cleave its way, unchecked, through stoutest steel.

And how to fashion from the ruddy gold Rings, torques and bracelets, also did he teach; And drinking-cups, o'erspread with lucky runes And likewise me the lore of Greece and Rome He taught, and how to read the starry heavens, And in the art of scald and saga-man Instructed me, for many things he knew. Aye, all the wisdom of the world seemed his. And these I loved, for somewhat of the bard Doth dwell within me, and my hand can strike Deftly the harp when me the spirit moves. But I the smithy's smoky air loved not. Rather the green-leafed forest and the chase, Or ocean, and the long lift of the wave. My part to wield the sword and boar-spear, not To make them. For each spirit hath its work, And in that work delights, whate'er it be, And doing other, joy becomes dull toil.

And Regin, though the same, from day to day, His smithy-task he taught me, read my heart, And knew it loved the forest, not the forge, And hungered for adventure, not to pass A sooty lifetime by the smithy fire. But pleased he seemed with his wild pupil's bent Rather than disappointed, and one morn, Standing beside his anvil, thus he spoke.

V

"Little use it is to teach King Sigmund's son
The secrets of the patient craftsman's art.
As well try to instruct the lion's whelp
In all the busy beaver's wondrous ways,
Or ancient lore of the laborious ant.
Willing thou art, my lad, but thou wast made
For other things:—to handle men, not tools;
To battle for thy people, and to rule
Justly thy realm. For every age hath need
Of such as thou—fearless and strong and true.
In thee thy sire and grandsire live again.
Take thou the sword, therefore, mine ancient hands
Shall forge thee, and go forth into the world:
Thy father's sword, Gram, which in that last fight
Did Odin, for some unknown reason, break.

His hand, not Hunding's, 'twas which struck the blow,

For Gram by mortal man was never riven.
But not for us it is, with human minds,
To question the high wisdom of the gods.
The sword he gave, that sword he took away,
And now to thee it goes. So speak the Norns.
Pray sit thee down, that I may tell the tale.

VI

"A noble hall thy grandsire, Volsung, built,
Oblong in shape, with great doors at each end,
And fitted up within with tables long
And benches stout, whereat his merry men
Wassailed, while on the wall the glittering shield
Hung idle, flanked by battle-axe and spear.
And in the middle of this banquet hall
An oak-tree, vast and venerable, grew —
Branstock his ancient name—whose towering trunk
Soared through the roof, and in the outer air
Bloomed with a myriad branches. Now one night,
When lighted were the fires in the great hall —
For winter time it was—and wagged the beards
Merrily, and the horns of nut-brown ale
Circled the board, there strode into the hall

A stranger with a drawn sword in his hand.

One-eyed he was and huge, a great slouched hat
Betopped his golden locks, and a blue cloak
Covered his shoulders. Not of earth he seemed,
But mystic, superhuman. Such his mien
None dared accost him. Odin 'twas in truth.
Through the great hall, and toward the old oak-tree
Swiftly he strode; then, for a moment, stopped,
And into Branstock plunged his glittering blade.
Up to its hilt in the great trunk it sank.
Then Odin spoke: 'Whoso from out this stock
Shall draw this sword, to him it shall belong;
A gift from me. No better weapon lives
'Twixt earth and heaven. Gram have I named it—
Gram

The Wrath.' So saying, from out the banquet hall, Huge, mystical, he passed; and in the night Vanished, and for a moment none dared move Or speak, but all like statues dumb remained, Awed by this presence from another world. Then spoke, at last, thy grandsire, Volsung, thus:

VII

"'Honored am I that to my banquet hall Hath come, this night, Odin, of gods the chief.

And honored will that puissant warrior be
Who from old Branstock draws the glittering steel.
Fain I, myself, at once, would clutch you hilt
And make the attempt, but courtesy forbids;
And to my guests, in the order of their rank,
First will the trial be given. Earl Sigger, thou
Lead off, and Heaven accord thee just success.'

VIII

"He ceased, and Sigger rose—a grim-faced earl
Of forty winters—and with brawny hands
Grasped the bright hilt. With might and main he strove,

While from his sea-tanned forehead broke the sweat Of fierce endeavor, but never budged the sword. And then stalked forth, one after another, men Famous of eld, lords of the land, and clutched, In turn, that hilt, and to dislodge the blade Strove, but in vain, till at the last remained No guest without his trial. Then Volsung spoke:

IX

"'Methinks the opportunity to me Fairly hath come, but ere I set my hand To draw from out his oaken scabbard Gram, I would that Sigmund first, my eldest son,
Essay the deed. Eager he is, I know:
Stout-hearted, and of strength beyond his years.
Perchance the youth may win where men have failed.'

X

"At this thy father, then a lissome lad Of twenty, tall and golden-haired, stepped forth And, grasping in his hands the bright hilt, drew, As easily as from out a limpid pool, The sword of Odin from the old oak-tree.

XI

"Amazement reigned and awe and, in some breasts, Black envy, which doth ever dog success. But Volsung proudly smiled upon the boy, And, in a voice affectionate, thus spoke:

XII

"'Honored art thou, my lad, above all men!
Bright doth the future lie before thee! Who Thee can resist, with Gram within thy hand?
Aye, well beloved of the immortal gods
Art thou, Sigmund, my son. Mind that thy life
Keep to high levels, like the eagle's flight;
Worthy of him whose favor thou hast won.'

XIII

"Thereafter did thy father wear the sword
Ever upon him, and in many a fierce
Battle its magic virtues proved; and ne'er
Did Gram once fail him till that fatal hour
When Odin, for some unknown reason, broke
The brand, and laid thy father low in death,
And unto hateful Hunding gave the fight.

XIV

"But I the mystic shards have kept, and now For thee, with Odin's help, will I re-forge Gram, that the son may emulate the sire, And thou mayst have a blade meet for thy need."

XV

So Regin took the shards of Gram, and forged From them a sword e'en like the first, with hilt Golden, and mystic runes upon the blade.

And when he bore it from the forge—ere yet The hilt was fitted and the runes engraved — Fire seemed to play about its tempered edge Like lightnings. And I grasped the sword and cried: "Now, Master, will we prove our weapon!" With that

I smote the smithy anvil, and the sword Clove through the iron block down to the stock, And on the floor the anvil, cut in twain, Rolled heavily, but not broken was the sword Nor dented, and I cried, "So far, so good!" And thereupon we went, Regin and I, Out to a mountain stream, and Regin cast A lock of lamb's wool up against the stream, And when it floated down upon the sword, 'Twas cut asunder, so keen-edged was that blade, And wild with joy I waved the brand on high. Then, grasping Regin's ancient hand in mine, "Master." I cried, "through thee is Gram re-born, What fierce assaults of men, what perils weird, Can I not face, with this to back my cause! Name me, O Master, some adventure wild Wherein my sword a baptism red may earn, And I, perchance, earth of some monster rid."

XVI

And Regin answered: "Prescient words are these. Unwittingly thy lips have named the deed. If thou dost win, glory world-wide is thine, Riches incalculable. If thou dost lose, Grim death will be thy portion. On yon bank

Let us sit down, that I may tell a tale
Of bygone years, when this gray spirit was young."

XVII

Then spoke the master to his pupil thus:

"In the old days, when the gods walked the earth,
Odin, Loki and ancient Hoenir once
Beside a waterfall sat down to rest;
And as they laughed and chatted they beheld,
Not far away, upon the river's brink,
An otter with a salmon in its mouth,
Caught freshly Then did Loki, in whose heart
Mischief was ever brewing, cast a stone
Swiftly, and slew the otter, and its skin
Stripped from the carcass, and gaily to his belt
Hung it. Quoth he, 'A trophy of the chase.'

XVIII

"Now, in the evening, to a woodsman's hut,
Hreidmar yclept, they came; and when the man
Sighted, at Loki's belt, the otter's skin,
Dark fury seized him. 'Murderer base!' he cried,
'Whence gattest thou that skin?' And Loki smiled,

And, smiling, spoke: 'Beside a waterfall,

At noon, we rested; I and my two friends.

And as we laughed and chatted we beheld,

Not far away, upon the river's brink,

An otter with a salmon in his mouth,

Caught freshly. And the beast I slew forthwith

And flayed him, and his pelt about my waist

Fastened. Behold! A trophy of the chase.'

XIX

"Then Hreidmar: 'Thou hast slain my youngest son,

Otter, who oft, by witchcraft, did assume
The otter's shape that he more easily
Might land the wily salmon from the stream.
I know the waterfall,—his favorite haunt.
Murderer thou art, and murderers are thy friends,
And straightway shall ye die, that my son's death
May be avenged. Ho! Fafnir! Regin! Quick!'

XX

"At this there strode into the little hut
A giant low of brow, of aspect fierce,
Fafnir, old Hreidmar's eldest son; and him
Close following came the second son, myself.
Ages ago was this, when earth was young—

For, as thou knowest, my life is full of years,
Ancient beyond the dreams of men—but still
Vivid, distinct as yesterday, doth show
Before my memory's eye, that fatal night.
Well-armed my father Hreidmar was; well-armed
Fafnir and I, with spears and axes good;
And hapless seemed the plight of the three gods;
For, as thou knowest, when the immortal gods
Put off their god-head, and assume the shapes
Of mortal men, and walk the ways of earth,
Subject to earthly laws they straight become.
Thus was it now, and hopeless seemed their plight;
Spirits eterne in earthly bodies caught;
Valhallan gods by earthly churls oppressed.

XXI

"Then suddenly Hreidmar to his victims spoke: 'Villains, one chance I'll give you for your lives. Cover you otter skin with glittering gold, Aye, every hair, and hence ye may depart!'

XXII

"Then Loki: 'Tis a bargain! My two friends Here will I leave, fit hostages, and soon Laden with glittering gold will I return.'

XXIII

"Beneath the waterfall a cavern deep Opened, though from the prying eyes of men Screened was its narrow entrance by the fall. And here the wily dwarf, Andvari, dwelt, Chief of the Niblungs; and, in galleries dark, Ever his gnomes here mined the yellow gold. And here was hidden that Niblung treasure vast, Famous of eld: bags, boxes filled with coins Golden and silvern: beautiful ornaments — Rings, neck-chains, bracelets, fillets for the hair, Brooches and buckles, earrings, lockets, combs, All of fine gold, and most of them with gems Adorned, with dazzling diamonds, fairest pearls, Rubies and sapphires, opals, emeralds rare, Green as the ocean deeps where Ægir reigns; And lamps and table vessels of fine gold — Wonderful platters, drinking-cups, great bowls, With many a mystic rune inscribed thereon. And round about, upon the cavern walls, Hung swords and spears, helmets and byrnies bright.

Daggers and knives, and other warlike gear.

And in the nooks and crannies of the rocks

Strange odds and ends had found a home. Whate'er

Seemed to the Niblung's avaricious eye
Of value, great or small, was here. A hoard
Motley and vast it was: one-half, methinks,
Born of the anvil of Andvari, half
Gathered through centuries from the outer world.
Spoil of slain armies! Loot of pillaged homes!
Flotsam and jetsam of wrecked argosies!

XXIV

"Well known to Loki was Andvari's hoard, And in his present need thereto he turned, Though little, in Valhalla, do the gods Value earth's riches. In that high abode All joys are theirs: naught else to be desired. Only on earth is yellow gold the king.

XXV

Now oft, within the stream, below the fall, Andvari, in the likeness of a pike, Sported,—for he the power of changing shapes Possessed,—and on this summer evening fair He sought its cooling waters crystalline. Him there did Loki find, and in a net Magic (by Ran the wife of Ægir made) Captured, and thus addressed the wily dwarf:

XXVI

"'Andvari, well I know thee: naught can change
That serpent eye of thine. Loki I am.
Now listen: three bags of gold must thou to-night
Take, and to Hreidmar's hut them swiftly bear,
That I my friends, Odin and Hoenir old,
May ransom. Gold enough an otter's skin
To cover, aye every hair, Hreidmar demands,
For I unwittingly have slain his son.
Quick must we act. How say'st thou, Niblung? Yes?
'Tis well; else would this good right hand have

Thy miser's life out, though it were in shape Of fish or fowl or serpent dark disguised.'

XXVII

"He ceased, and thus Andvari answered him:
'Let me once more my natural shape assume,
And I will strive the gold to gather. Ah me!
Good Loki, little my poverty thou know'st.
But I will do my best. Yea, three full bags
Of gold I promise. Pray release me now.'

XXVIII

"At this the god upon the frightened dwarf Relaxed his hold and him upon the ground Cast; and Andvari straightway reassumed His human shape and, toward the waterfall Moving, cried out, 'Valhallan, follow me!'

XXIX

"Now when they reached the cavern's mouth the dwarf

Halted and, crying 'Enter!' stood on one side.

And Loki entered and beheld the vast

Chamber, from which long corridors branched out,

Leading to other chambers underground.

And everywhere swart Niblungs, grimy gnomes,

His eye encountered: bags of treasure some

Carried to and fro, and others at the forge

Wrought, and yet others in deep galleries toiled

With pick and shovel—all on labor bent,

Labor unending. And Andvari cried,

'Ho slaves! Three bags of gold!' And straightway rushed

Three Niblung gnomes, and seized the bags, and them Fetched to their master. And Andvari said, 'Here is the gold. Let us away!' At once Each gnome upon his back hoisted a bag And, following Loki and Andvari, passed Out of the cave, into the forest wild.

XXX

"Now when to Hreidmar's fateful hut had come This strange procession Loki through the door Strode, smiling, followed by the Niblung chief, Andvari, and his grimy goblins three, Who on the floor their bags of treasure cast. And Loki cried, 'Here is the gold! Bring forth The otter's skin, that we may cover it!' And thereupon my father brought the skin, And stretched it on the floor, and fell to work, Greedily, to cover with the shining gold The furry garment of his otter son. But though at first more than enough there seemed Of treasure, as my father wrought the skin Grew larger, or, at least, so seemed to grow, Till, at the last, when empty was each bag, One hair upon the muzzle of the beast Was still uncovered. Then my father spoke.

XXXI

"'Methinks one muzzle-hair—plain to be seen — Is not yet covered! What say ye, knaves, to this? Know that your bargain ye must wholly keep, And covered must be every single hair, Or ye must die! What say ye, villains? Quick!'

XXXII

- "Then Loki, turning to Andvari, spoke:
- 'Niblung, hast thou more gold?' Answered the dwarf:
- 'No more have I, my lord; here or elsewhere.'

XXXIII

"But Hreidmar's was the greed insatiate. Thus Coldly he spoke: 'Methinks upon the hand Of that dark dwarf a glittering ring I see—A golden serpent with two ruby eyes—Throw that upon the skin and ye are free.'

XXXIV

"Andvari then: 'Rather my life than that!'

XXXV

"But, wild with the lust of gold, old Hreidmar clutched

Fiercely the dwarf; and, him as in a vise Holding, from off his finger wrenched the ring.

XXXVI

- "Rage uncontrollable Andvari seized.
- 'Accurst for evermore be Hreidmar! Accurst For evermore be Hreidmar's house!' he cried.

'Accurst be he who wears the Niblung's ring!
Accurst be he who holds the Niblung's gold!
May hate, disease, misfortunes dire, all ills
Conceivable, unutterable woe,
Tortures of mind and body, pursue the steps
Of him who wears the ring or holds the gold!
Curst be his lot until his dying day!
O woe! Woe! Woe! What now is life to me!
Lost is the Niblung's power without his ring!'

XXXVII

"But Hreidmar only laughed. 'Begone ye knaves! Free are ye one and all! And as for thee, Impudent dwarf, I fear thy curses not.'

XXXVIII

"Thereafter went the gods upon their way
Rejoicing, and the Niblung sought his cave;
But Hreidmar gathered up the glittering gold,
And in the sacks re-stowed it, and beside
His treasure watched, sleepless, till morning dawned.

XXXXIX

"Then Fafnir huge, whose glowering face bespoke Evil within, addressed our father thus: 'Meseems 'twere fairer, since three bags of gold
The Niblung brought, that each of us one bag
Take as his share, and not that all the gold
To thee alone should go. Good sons are we,
Trusty and strong; and had it not been for us,
Regin and me, with our stout spears, methinks
'Twould have gone hard with thee. Let us divide,
Therefore, the Niblung's gold into three parts,
One part for each. What say'st thou, father mine?'

XL

"But Hreidmar answered curtly: 'I trow not. The gold is mine, and mine it shall remain.'

XLI

"Then Fafnir: 'Miser! Thy blood be on thy head!' And straightway through our father's body he drove His spear gigantic, and prone upon the floor, With a great cry, old Hreidmar tumbled,—dead.

XLII

"Thus went into effect, without delay,
The Niblung's Curse: like a malignant star,
Launched into ether by demoniac hands,
Henceforth to burn, casting its influence dire
On all who wear the ring or hold the gold.

XLIII

"And Fafnir pulled from his dead father's hand
The Niblung's ring, and placed it on his own,
(A golden serpent with two ruby eyes)
And—me, perchance, mistrusting—from the hut
His treasure bore, seeking some safer spot;
Till, wandering through the wood, he came at last

(Led, peradventure, by some power occult)
Unto the waterfall, and there sat down.
And long he gloated o'er his glittering gold.
And as he gazed upon the ring he kissed,
Softly, the shining band; and straightway came
From out the cavern's mouth the Niblung dwarf,
Andvari, and knelt down upon the sand
Low before Fafnir, crying 'What wouldst thou have?

Slaves of the ring are we, I and my gnomes.

Whoso possesses that possesses us.

A power unseen impels us though we strive
Against its bidding. Whoso possesses us,
His is the Niblung's gold: that mighty hoard,
Garnered through the centuries. If thou wouldst enjoy

The glorious spectacle, enter and claim thine own.'

XLIV

"So saying, the dwarf arose; and, with both hands, Pointed to the waterfall; then, bowing low, Strode toward the cavern's mouth; and Fafnir, filled With wonder and greedy joy, him followed close. And when the son of Hreidmar saw the Hoard, Motley and vast, seemingly limitless, He laughed, and smote his hands together, and cried,

'Ah. luckiest mortal in the world am I! Here will I bide, amidst my glittering gold!' And there abode he; but, as passed the years, Slowly he changed from bad to worse, and grew Into a thing of horror, half man, half beast; And in the end a creature wholly beast Became, a dragon loathsome, hideous, fierce, Cruel and powerful, from whose scaly hide, Hard as wrought iron, the sharpest spear rebounds, All unavailing. And there abides he still. But I, within my father's hut, alone, Deep in the forest, dwelt for many a year. And later, from that sage of ancient days, Mimer, the wisest man in all the north, I learned the sword-smith's art. Then, as thou knowest,

King Sigmund sought, and him served till he died. And now what thinkest thou of my story, lad?"

XLV

"Fafnir," I answered, "shall be Gram's first meat.
What say'st thou, Master? Brother of thine is he,
I know, but also murderer of thy sire.
Earth were well rid of him. Is it not so?
Thy silence gives approval, Master mine.
To-day will I make ready for the fight;
To-morrow will I face this monster; aye,
E'en in his lair. May Odin grant success!"

XLVI

"And wilt thou take the treasure and the ring Attainted? Wilt thou brave the Niblung's curse?"

XLVII

Thus Regin, and to him I made reply:
"I know not. What think'st thou? 'Twere well,

indeed,

To ponder this. Perchance, when comes the hour, Odin my course will guide. Great plans have I, Master, for the future. Firstly, to avenge My father's death, and Hundung's sons destroy; And next, with ships and men to sally forth

O'er the great ocean, distant lands to view.
For these things gold were welcome—gold to buy
Stout galleys, gold to man them. Think'st thou not,
Master, that if this now attainted hoard
Were put to uses good the curse might die?"

XLVIII

And Regin answered: "Aye, perchance it might; And yet I fear 'twill not. Terrible to me It seems, this ancient curse, and fraught with ills Unending. But my spirit fails with age, And ever doubtful and despondent grows; Fearful of all things, longing for life's end: Not like the buoyant soul that lives in thee, Bright as the sun of Easter-month and strong. Balder thou art, methinks, come back to earth: Balder, the springtime jubilant, whose face Fronts the inconstant future with a smile: Eager to breast the battle and the gale; Eager to pit thyself against the world And try which be the stronger, it or thou. Balder thou art, but Hoder old am I, Hoder, the winter, white with deepening snows. Little I know, now at life's end; but if 'Tis possible to bring the curse to naught

Thy plan will do it: evil thwart with good.
But let me end this tale, while yet my tongue
Hath power of speech, for shadows of the grave
Beset me, and scarce comes my fleeting breath.
Death's hand upon my stiffening limbs I feel.
Methinks the end is near. List now, my lad!
When I am gone search thou the smithy chest—
A map thine eyes will find—the waterfall—
The Niblung's cave—not far from here they lie.
Easily to be reached when once the way is known.
Go forth and do the deed. Long hath the world Waited for thee. May Odin guide thy hand!"

XLIX

So saying, from its earthly dwelling-place, Swiftly, with scarce a bodily tremor, passed The ghost of Regin; and as from the fields Rises the laverock to the azure sky Rejoicing; so, methinks, that noble soul, Leaving its worn-out garment, rose in air, Rejoicing to Valhalla, and there abides.

L

But I—when near the smithy door these hands His withered frame had buried—my Master's words Remembered, and sought out the ancient chest,
And searched within its depths, and found the map,
E'en as his dying voice had bidden me. Lo!
Traced on the yellow parchment, plotted with care,
The waterfall—the Niblung's cave! Not far
From the old smithy was the spot, a scant
League through the forest; easily to be reached
When once the way was known. And in my hand
I grasped my father's weapon, Gram the Wrath,
The gift of Odin, now, by Regin's skill
Re-born for me; and, lifting him on high,
I swore before the morrow's sun should set
To slay the dragon or myself be slain.

LI

Now when the moon had risen I wandered out Into the forest, and though my first intent Had been to sally forth at break of day On my adventure, fresh and strong from sleep, Yet ever toward the Niblung's cave my feet Moved, by a power resistless drawn, like steel Drawn by the magnet, so that I, ere long, Had gone full half the distance. Suddenly, then, Before me, like a spectral shape, appeared, Right in my path standing, a figure strange.

One-eyed he was and huge, a great slouched hat Betopped his golden locks, and a blue cloak Covered his shoulders. Not of earth he seemed, But mystic, superhuman. Such his mien Awe filled my bosom. Odin 'twas in truth. Quoth he: "Where goest thou, Sigurd?" I replied:

"Fafnir to slay." Then he: "And fear'st thou not To attempt the deed? Fafnir is strong and fierce, Cruel and terrible." "But I fear him not," I cried. "Within my hand I hold the sword My father, Sigmund, from the old oak-tree Wrested; the gift of Odin, Gram the Wrath, Re-born through Regin's skill. Why should I fear This dragon? Through his loathsome mail my blade,—

Magic, invincible,—will I thrust, and pierce
His devil's heart. No! No! I fear him not!"
Then Odin: "Worthy son of a brave sire
Art thou, my lad: courage aye wins success.
But list! Wait not until to-morrow dawns,
But go to-night. Each morn comes Fafnir forth
From out his lair, the Niblung's cavern vast,
To slake his thirst beside the waterfall.
His trail thou wilt perceive in the soft sand.

Dig thou to-night a pit, narrow and deep,
Upon the trail, and stand within the pit,
And when at break of day comes Fafnir forth
And moves along his trail, and covers thee,
Thrust upward with thy sword and pierce his heart.
Farewell." So saying,—like a wraith that comes
Out of the unknown, and shows itself, and then
To the unknown returns,—he disappeared.

LII

So swiftly through the forest now I strode,
My heart on fire, until the waterfall,
White in the moonlight, did mine eyes behold.
And to the stream below the fall I came,
And searched upon the sand, and straightway found
The dragon's trail; and on the trail I dug,
With my good sword, as Odin had bidden me,
A pit, narrow and deep, then into the pit
Got, sword in hand, and waited for the dawn.

LIII

Now at the earliest light came Fafnir forth, From out the Niblung's cave, his thirst to slake; And as I stood within the pit my gaze Followed his every motion. Huge his frame,

Armored with dusky scales: his upreared head Helmeted like the basilisk's: his eye Malignant, like the basilisk's, and cold; Repulsive, as in every age hath been The eye of reptile, filling with strange fear, Horror inexplicable, the hearts of men. His giant jaws were partly open; his whole Saurian visage ruthless, terrible. Along the earth his length ten fathoms stretched, Loathsome to look upon. A crocodile With wings, he looked, but huger; more, methinks, Like some vast brute of earlier ages born. Out from his lair beneath the waterfall He passed, then, turning, down along the stream Pursued his sluggish course. Hideous the sight! But I, e'en when he neared me, felt no fear. And as his carcass lumbered o'er the pit, And sudden darkness filled the narrow space, Up through his yellow under-hide I drove Gram to his heart. Forth, like a river, rushed The dragon's blood; and me from head to foot In liquid blackness bathed. (For black as night Was Fafnir's blood, compound of evils gross.) Then from the pit I clomb, and drew the steel From out the monster, who me thus addressed:

LIV

"What man art thou whose crafty thrust hath drawn My life-blood? And what purpose moved thy heart? Unknown thou art to me, unharmed by me. Whence comest thou? Who hath urged thee to this deed?"

LV

Then I: "Fafnir, thou knowest me not: but thee I know. A monster execrable. Right soon Dead wilt thou be through bite of my good sword. Without thee earth were happier. But methinks Upon thy claw a glittering ring I see—A golden serpent with two ruby eyes. That will I take. All else of thee may rot."

LVI

Then Fafnir: "'Tis the Niblung's ring. A curse Goes with it. Dost thou know the evil tale?"

LVII

"The tale I know, but nathless will I take
The ring and wear it. The Niblung's gold I need."
So saying, from the dragon's claw I drew
The glittering band that rules Andvari's hoard.

LVIII

"May the curse blast thee!" Fafnir screamed—then died.

LIX

Then from the cave came forth the Niblung dwarf, Andvari, and beheld the dragon dead: Though weltering still in his black blood, as worms, Both great and small, are wont to do when slain. And on his knees, before me, fell the dwarf, Crying, "Hail Master! Wearer of the Ring! Whoso possesses that, possesses us— Custodians of the Hoard. What wouldst thou have? Immeasurable wealth is thine. Behold The Niblung's cave! Enter and claim thine own." And straightway (following the dwarf, who rose And went before me) toward the waterfall I strode and, passing underneath the force, Entered the narrow portal of the cave. And thereupon my wondering eyes beheld, E'en as my Master's words had pictured it, The chamber vast wherein the Niblungs dwell. And from it dusky corridors branched out, Leading to other chambers underground. And everywhere swart Niblungs, grimy gnomes,

Mine eyes encountered: bags of treasure some Carried to and fro, and others at the forge Wrought, and yet others in deep galleries toiled With pick and shovel—all on labor bent, Labor unending. And Andvari cried, "Master, here shalt thou dwell and be our chief; Reigning, like Fafnir, over limitless wealth!"

LX

But I the crafty Niblung thus bespoke:

"Thy gloomy halls, Andvari, charm me not.
Rather, for me, the open air, the sun,
The moon, the stars, the forest and the sea.
Nathless, great projects for the future years
I've planned, and for their fit accomplishment
This wealth is needed. Therefore bid thy gnomes
Three sacks of gold make ready, and through the wood,

Straightway to Regin's smithy carry them.

Anon, perhaps, more treasure will I need
My plans to prosper; therefore be prepared.

Like the young eagle doth my spirit burn
To spread its wings, not underneath the ground
To burrow like the mole. Dost understand

Niblung? Remain thou here, my vassal true,

Custodian of the Hoard; remain and wait My coming. Be thou regent here for me, Sigurd, thy master, who doth wear the ring."

LXI

And low Andvari bowed, and answered: "Aye, My master, well I'll guard the Hoard." Then cried: "Ho slaves! Three bags of gold!" And straightway rushed

Three Niblung gnomes, and seized the bags, and them

Fetched to their master. And Andvari said:

"Here is the gold, my lord." And I replied:

"Let us away!" At once, upon his back

Each gnome a bag of treasure swung, and then—

They following me—we passed out of the cave,

And thence to Regin's ancient smithy came.

Here did the gnomes their treasure leave, and then

Straightway unto the Niblung's cave returned.

LXII

Thereafter did I seek a seaport old,
Not far away, famed as a rendezvous
Of fisherfolk and vikings; and here bought
Three galleys good and them o'erhauled and named

The Dragon, Wolf and Bear, and for the prow Of each the shipwrights carved a figurehead In keeping with the name, and gilded it, And fair they were to see. (E'en those thine eves Beheld this morn.) And then for each I shipped A crew of lusty lads, all ocean-bred, Skilful with oar and canvas, sword and spear. Vikings who loved, like me, the wanderer's life. And when to snow-clad earth once more returned Bright Balder, and unlocked the frozen streams, And lifted from the world its mantle white. And spread o'er land and sea his prospering airs, I to avenge my father's death set out. And up the coast of Norroway we sailed Unto that land where Hunding once did rule. Long since was Hunding dead, but o'er the land Still ruled his breed, two cruel sons and false, Lyngi and Horward; and upon their coasts Falling, fierce as the famished wolf, by night, We caught them unawares, at wassail, and slew All but a handful of their men-at-arms, And left the banquet hall a blazing pyre. And at the last the two kings turned to fly, Craven, but I faced them in their flight and cried: "Be men, not swine! Sigurd am I, the son

Of Sigmund, whom your father foully slew. Prepare to die!" And Lyngi, the elder, raised His sword to strike, but ere he struck, fell Gram, Swiftly descending, upon his helm, and clove Helmet and head and mail-clad body in twain. And on the ground the two halves fell apart. And Horward, likewise, did Gram cleave in twain, E'en as he turned to fly. Then from the land Of Hunding's sons I passed,—my father's death Avenged,—and that fair territory sought Which Hunding from my noble sire did wrest -That spot beloved where first the light of earth My infant eyes beheld. Gone was the home Where Sigmund once and sweet Siglinda dwelt-That noble hall my grandsire, Volsung, built, Up through whose roof the mighty oak-tree soared, Branstock, and bloomed within the outer air: That hall where once the bearded heroes sat Drinking, with lightsome hearts, the nut-brown ale; While on the lofty wall each glittering shield Hung idle, flanked by battle-axe and spear; That hall to which, amidst the wassail, came The one-eyed stranger with the unsheathed sword, Odin, and silent stalked across the room, And into Branstock plunged the glittering blade.

Gone was that noble hall, by Hunding's hand Fired on that midnight twice seven years before. When fell my father and my mother fled, As flies the stricken deer, to Regin's forge. Gone was my childhood's home, and, as I walked About the blackened spot where once it stood Tears filled my eyes. Then, from afar and near, Hearing of my return whom they thought dead, Came, in the months which followed, henchmen old, Who for my father oft had borne the spear. And these, and many others, me besought Henceforth to abide with them and rule the land. And for a time I tarried and, perchance, Better had it been if I had there remained. Ruling the kingdom which my father ruled. But evermore the call of the great world, In accents irresistible, I heard — Sweet voices from beyond our boreal seas, Voices from out the magic realms of Rome, Singing of ampler knowledge, higher arts, Of nobler manners and a fuller life; Singing a land by Nature's kindliest smile Illumined, of all earth the garden spot; A fair domain in which the Midland Sea. Lay like a sapphire in a golden brooch;

A land enchanted, where the stately walls Of villas and of palaces uprose Innumerable, by gardens fair begirt, Under whose bosky shade pale statues stood; Singing a nation proud and puissant, dam Of valiant sons, who to their mother's knee The treasures of remotest earth had brought: Singing a realm ruled from the Tiber's banks; A peaceful land by warriors' spears upheld; An ordered state where safe was each one's life: An empire splendid as the midday sun, Within whose bounds the mind of man had reached Its highest, and his hand had wrought its best. And which, like the great sun, did radiate Upon our earth its light beneficent. This and yet more the voices sang to me. Till on my spirit a wild wander-lust Seized, and dissatisfied were all my days. So in my place a kinsman strong and true. In whom the blood of Volsung likewise ran. Thorwald, surnamed The Incorruptible, I left as ruler of the little state, And for a cruise began to make prepare Long and uncertain. Stores my ships required. And of the mariners who with me sailed

Against the sons of Hunding some were slain And others, having wife and bairn, perchance, Loved not so long a voyage, so with men From my own land the vacancies I filled, Till every ship her complement contained — Some youngsters like myself, old sea-dogs some, Graybeards who had my father Sigmund served, And loved the son because the sire they loved. And for the Wolf and Bear captains I chose, Strong men by nature fitted for command. Eric the Wanderer one, who on the deep Was born, and all his life upon the deep Had dwelt, till scarce he knew the touch of earth: To him the Wolf I gave. And to the Bear Hakon the son of Halfdan I assigned. A man of temper fierce, yet wise withal, Intrepid, yet a cautious counselor. And of the largest vessel of the three, The Dragon, I myself assumed command.

LXIII

Then set we sail once more, with eager hearts, And, bearing westward, sought the famous isle Of Britain, where till late the Roman ruled. And first the foggy Shetlands we beheld, And landed, and Norse rovers like ourselves Everywhere found, on wild adventure bent, Hovering like ospreys ere they strike their prey. Thence to the Orkneys southerly we sailed, And likewise here the ships of Northland found, For springtime 'twas, and every viking bold His summer cruise was planning, and in dreams Himself beheld returning to his home — What time the autumn's briefer days are come— With galleys laden to the water's edge, Silver and gold and splendid booty his. Then down the rocky Caledonian coast We made our way until that famous wall Which Roman Hadrian built against the Picts We reached, and here a while on shore I stayed, That I might view this marvel of men's hands. From ocean unto ocean it extends. From far Ituna on the western shore To Segedunum on the east, where falls The river Tyne into the northern sea. Aye, fourscore miles, o'er hill and dale and plain,— Rising and falling with the varied land — It stretches, like some sleeping serpent vast. Built is't of stone, with ample fosse in front; So broad its top that, at the narrowest parts,

Three men with shields and spears can walk abreast;

And all along that top a line of towers — Endless unto the eye it seems—stands guard: And all along behind the wall great camps, Cities more like, at intervals are reared. Here, till of late, the Roman stood on guard, Northernmost outpost of his empire vast. A wondrous sight it was to me, this wall, To me whose eyes, though hoping to behold Earth's greatest works, perchance e'en Rome itself. Had seen, as yet, naught but the wilderness, Gray ocean, and the mountains of the north. A wondrous sight it is, though swift decay Already hath begun to sap its strength. For Rome, to-day, is not what she hath been. And hath abandoned Britain to its fate. And so, perforce, neglected stands the wall. And in that distant island where once reigned Law, and secure were property and life, And years of peace had brought prosperity, Confusion now, low crime and rapine rule; And like a wife left husbandless, who stands Alone and unprotected, is the land, Bereft of the strong shelter of Rome's arm.

LXIV

Now once more to the southward did we steer. Skirting the rugged coast, till Humber's mouth We reached and entered and, as in the isles Of Orkney and of Shetland, here we found The Norsemen's ships, aye, everywhere we went, In port or on the wing, they seemed to be. With broidered sails and golden figureheads Glittering in the sunshine, and the warriors' shields, When o'er the deep they journeyed, outboard hung Along the gunwales. And to me the thought Came, and hath lingered with me ever since. That, as the Roman hath this favored isle Abandoned to its fate, to sink or swim, Perchance 'twill be the Norseman's destiny To people and to rule it, and, in truth, A land well suited is it to our race.

LXV

Then down the coast once more we sailed away, Past many a headland bold and harbor snug, Until at last the mouth of Thames we reached. And here I should have entered—for my plan Was and still is, at future day, to see Londinium, of all British towns the chief,

The largest and the richest in the isle.— But learning that unfriendly were the folk. And being-though my vikings scoffed at fear-Not overstrong in ships and men, I deemed Prudence the part of wisdom and forebore. Then hearing praise of Burgundy and thee, And longing to behold the river Rhine, I bade farewell to Britain's foggy land. Thence borne along by favorable winds, We toward the Frisian coast our galleys' heads Turned, and that level region sighted soon -Low as the ocean—where, through many a mouth, Rhine's waters pass into the northern sea. And by that mouth we entered where doth lie Batavia's famous isle—Batavian once. Then Roman and now Frank—but showing still. In many a solid road and well-built wall, And many a fortress fashioned with all skill, Strongest the impress of Rome's master hand, For Rome doth ever build to last for aye. A noted spot hath always been this land Right at Rhine's mouth. Here, from the gloomy depths

Of the Hercynian Forest came, at first, The fierce Batavi and upon this isle Founded a habitation and a home;
Here, later, by that sibyl fair inflamed
Bructerian, who within the dark tower dwelt,
Civilis, chafing from his chains unjust,
Marshaled his doughty clans and fought with Rome;

And here his fleet the son of Drusus formed, Wherewith to bear his legions to the Elbe. And subjugate the warlike Teuton land — A task e'en for Germanicus too great, For though in battle thrice his foes he drave Before him, yet unconquered was the land, And hath remained so till this very day. But let me to my narrative return. O'er all this low Rhine country now doth rule (As well ye know, Burgundians, whose domain Borders upon his own) a Frankish king, Wise Merovæus, son of Clodion. Haply I met, and friendly were his words, Bidding me tarry long within his realm, Or up the Rhine proceed with ships and men, As my convenience suited. And although Pleasant it would have been to linger there Tasting the welcome of our new-found friends, The wanderer's heart within me drove me on.

LXVI

So set we forth once more, 'twixt fertile shores Steering, low as the wave, until, at last. From out that hollow land of dune and dyke Emerging, we to loftier regions came. And as our little fleet the noble stream Ascended slow, day after day my eyes Some thought-compelling spectacle beheld. For on our right, with many a tower and town, Was Rome, or what was once the Roman realm, And on our left the peoples of the north. And oft upon the future of this land I mused, and wondered whether e'er again Would Rome her pristine puissance regain, Or whether here the peoples of the north — Thy race and mine, O king,—should henceforth rule.

And to my mind it seemed that Rome must pass,
That her all-conquering arm must some time fail,
And her illuming sun must some time sink;
And, after night, another sun must rise,
Another day must dawn upon the earth,
Another race must rule these hills and streams,
Perchance the fair-haired children of the north.
For such is Nature's way. Empires like men

Grow old and die, and in their place new states, Like generations new of men, arise.

LXVII

Thus musing, day by day, at last I came Unto thy realm, here royal welcome found, And now join with thee at this festal board To celebrate the auspicious hour wherein, Seven years ago, thy happy reign began.

End of Sigurd's Narrative

LXVIII

He ceased; and round the mighty table ran
The applause of many hands; and from the lips
Of knights and ladies who, erstwhile, had sat
Rapt listeners, words of warm approval rose.
The buzz of many voices filled the air.
Then Gunter thus: "A gallant tale well told.
Methinks our brother of the north was born
A warrior and a saga-man in one.
Like the first Cæsar, whom our fathers fought,
The mighty Julius, well he tells his deeds.
We thank him one and all. But let us not

Him weary with a feast too long drawn out, For after travel nature craves repose. One parting cup we'll have, and then good-night."

LXIX

So saying, from his seat he rose and stood,
Six feet of kingliness, before his guests;
Then, lifting high in air his golden cup,
Studded with precious stones, and crying, "Sir
Knights,

Here's to the ladies! Our sweethearts and our wives,

Our mothers and our sisters! Here's to all!"
He set the beaker to his bearded lips
And quaffed, to the last drop, the ruddy wine.
And likewise did the knights with one accord
Rise, at the selfsame moment as the king,
And, standing with uplifted goblets, cry
"The Ladies," and drink down the good red wine.
And on the hand of Sigurd, as he held
His cup aloft and quaffed the ruddy draught,
Was seen, by those near by, the jewel rare
Whereof his lips had spoken: the Niblung's ring,
A golden serpent with two ruby eyes,
Shining, with baleful light, beneath the lamps.

IV

THE TOURNAMENT

Ι

Now, that he might still further celebrate
His coronation's anniversary, and
Still further entertain his northland guests,
Gunter proclaimed a day for manly sports—
Contests of strength and skill: athletic feats
And martial exercises manifold,
Such as all vikings love, for Sigurd's men:
For the Burgundian knights a tournament.

II

Bright rose the summer sun above the Rhine,
Blazoning the river and the plain beyond,
Filled, on this morning of the tournament,
Already with a concourse of brave knights.
Here, in a spacious meadow, smooth and green,
Betwixt the city and the forest set,
Were placed the lists. Here, on the close-cut sward,
In shape a giant crescent, gay with flags,
Rose the pavilion of the king. And here,

Arrayed in gala-day apparel, drest
In gowns of every color, reigned The Fair —
The dames and damosels of Gunter's court,
The flowers of Burgundy, high o'er the lists
Sitting, sweet umpires of the deeds of men.
Here, of the fair the fairest, sat Gudrun.

Ш

Now, when all things were ready, the heralds blew Their horns; and Sigurd's sailors on the green Appeared, guests of the king, and therefore first To show their prowess on the listed field.

IV

Running and wrestling matches then were seen;
Throwing the hammer, vaulting with the pole;
The tug of war, wherein the brawny crews
Of Sigurd's ships against each other strove.
And then the archer's skill the throng engrossed,
And fencing bouts, and casting the swift spear,
And other warlike exercises. All
Of these the crowd beheld with keen delight,
Greeting with many a cheer or loud "Well done!"
The winners of each trial of strength or skill.

V

Next comes the chief event, the tournament, Wherein two parties of Burgundian knights Strive for the victory. Gathered on each side Of the great meadow now, impatiently, The signal they await. And first a blast Preparative the heralds sound, and straight The turnpikes of the lists are opened wide. And on the level field the knights debouch. Gay, clad in glittering mail, a gallant sight, Each with his lady's favor round his helm Fastened, or from left shoulder hanging free. One party in the north end of the field Ranges, in the south the other. The heralds next A second signal give, and thereupon Each cavalier his spear and shield doth dress And everything makes ready. Now, at the third Blast of the trumpets, lo, they're off! The knights Put spurs to their good steeds and o'er the field Against their adversaries ride full tilt. The meadow, beaten by tempestuous hoofs, Trembles as in an earthquake; while the din Of charging squadrons fills the expectant air. (Ah, wildly flutters now each maiden's heart!) As two great ocean surges sometimes rush

Against each other, driven by contrary winds, So rush these rival companies of knights Each against other and, meeting in midfield, Shock, with a sound like distant thunder, or The boom of the swift surf upon the shore. And many a broken lance flew up in air, And many a lusty knight to earth was thrown, And wildly did the crowd the victors cheer.

VI

Then spoke King Gunter unto Sigurd thus:
"Wouldst like, Sir Knight, to try a tilt? Although Unused thou art to our Burgundian ways,
Gallantly I know thou wouldst acquit thyself."

VII

And Sigurd answered: "Knightly tournament Ne'er have mine eyes beheld until this hour. Yet from my boyhood to bestride a horse Hath been my keen delight; that, and to ride The restless waves of ocean, the untamed steeds Of the wild waste of waters. The horseman's skill, Therefore, is mine already; perchance some touch Of the tourney's art, all unknown to myself, May come to me as down the lists I ride

Against mine adversary, and I, the esquire,
May tilt the knight. Yet, if I be o'erthrown,
What matter? 'Tis but the sport of a summer's day,
And wiser for the lesson shall I be."

VIII

Then Gunter: "Thou dost speak like a true knight. Our Hagen here will try a tilt with thee, The captain of my men-at-arms, the best Lance in all Burgundy. Come, Hagen, show Our sailor guest how Rhinelanders can joust."

IX

And Hagen, grim, black-bearded, with great frame Teutonic, saying, "Thy wish is law, my king," Stepped down into the lists, and soon appeared Armed cap-a-pie, ready for the mimic fray.

X

Then yet again spoke Gunter to his guest:
"Take thou my charger, and my tilting lance,
Gauntlets and shield, for thine own arms, fair knight,
Are all too serious for our sportful jousts.
'Tis but mock combat. And if thou wouldst wear
Favor of some sweet lady in the lists,

As doth beseem knight young and comely, lo, Choose from yon bunch of beauties!" So saying, he glanced Upward to where, a lily in the midst Of clustering roses, sat the fair Gudrun, Begirt by the twelve damsels of her bower.

ΧI

And Sigurd: "If it be not overbold,
Sire, to thus voice the verdict of my eyes,
This wise my thought doth run:—above, below,
To right, to left, nothing so beautiful
As the fair Princess of the realm I see;
Gudrun, the lily maid of Burgundy.
Her favor, thou being willing, I fain would wear."

XII

Then, by her brother bidden, down stept Gudrun From that array of beauty, and round the arm Of Sigurd bound her favor, a blue sleeve Broidered with golden lilies. And as she bound Deftly the sleeve she murmured, "Thou, Sir Knight, My champion art"; and Sigurd answered low, "Princess, with this, thy token, round mine arm, Methinks I could o'erwhelm a world of men."

XIII

And Sigurd the king's charger mounted and took
His tilting lance and shield and gauntlets e'en
As Gunter him had bidden; and to the north
End of the spacious meadow rode and there
Waited the signal. And Hagen in the south
His station took, and silent there abode,
Motionless, gigantic, like some towering shape
Equestrian, by the sculptor wrought of bronze.
And Sigurd's horse was snow-white, but the steed
Of Hagen black as midnight was. And thrice
The trumpets blew, and at the third blast the knights—

Sunshine against shadow—moved to the assault.

XIV

And Sigurd dressed his shield and couched his spear And, putting spurs to his horse, dashed down the field Like a whirlwind: and the blue sleeve of Gudrun, Made fast near his left shoulder, backward streamed Like pennant in the gale, beheld of all, Her favor. And full tilt at Hagen he rode, And in the midst of his defenses struck The Burgundian knight. And Hagen, by the shock Lifted from out his saddle and backward borne,

Reeled o'er the crupper of his horse, and fell
Half a spear's length behind. And on the sward,
Stunned by the fall, all motionless, he lay,
Seemingly dead. And silent the people sat
At sight of their great champion overthrown.
But Gunter cried: "Well done, Sigurd!" And the crowd,

Hearing the king's voice, broke forth into cheers.

XV

Then came attendants out and Hagen bore, Half-conscious, from the lists; and led away The sable charger, whinnying for his lord. And thus, that day, the sports came to an end.

XVI

And Sigurd, dreaming of Gudrun, forgot — Or but remembered as light sport—his joust With Hagen; but the dark Burgundian knight, Being vanquished, forgot not his vanquishment; And, brooding ever o'er the event, hot rage Against his vanquisher turned to hatred cold, Which, like a venemous serpent, dwelt concealed Within his breast, waiting its time to strike.

V

SIGURD AND GUDRUN

Ι

Within her bower the lily maid Gudrun
Sat with her damsels twelve and with deft hands
Rich hangings for the palace walls they wrought.
And of these hangings there were seven, and each
The fair presentment of a deity
Bore on its front, in divers colored threads
Embroidered. The Supernal Powers they were
To whom the seven days of every week
Are sacred. Them upon the costly cloth
The damsels wrought in gorgeous colorings.

П

Now as they worked came Sigurd to the bower And looked within, and him Gudrun beheld And, smiling, cried, "Enter, my lord. To-day We maidens toil upon a mighty task. These seven hangings for the banquet hall We fain would finish. For a year and more Them have we worked upon; but now, at last,

Methinks they're nearly done. Behold, my lord! Knowest thou these ancient deities for whom The seven days of every week are named?"

Ш

And Sigurd answered, "Aye, I know them well."
Then, gazing on the broideries, each in turn,
While to his words the lily maid Gudrun
And all her damsels twelve, a lovely sight,
Listened with rapt attention, thus he spake.

IV

"Behold, of all the first, the golden Sun
Shining upon this lofty mountain top!
The source of light! The eye of Odin great!
All vivifying—all sustaining Power!
Him do we honor on the week's first day,
Him do we praise. For what were this dark earth
Without his light—thrice blessed, heavenly light?
E'en as the halls of Hela cold, where dwell
The spirits of the wicked ones, would be
This world of ours without his glorious lamp!

٦,

"Next comes Our Lady of the silver moon. Her do we honor on the second day. Well have ye done, fair maids, to paint her thus—Shining at night upon the tranquil sea,
Smiling, perchance, upon the mariner
As homeward to his heart's desire he goes—
His heart's desire who in her bower doth sit,
Gazing at Luna and her lane of light,
And longing for her lover in her arms.
Ah Moon, fair Moon, how beautiful thou art!

VI

"But what a change when to the week's third day We come! Behold, equipped with helm and spear And byrnie bright, the one-armed god of war, Brave Tyr, whose missing limb the Fenris Wolf Tore off, in fury, at the elbow joint! A bright exemplar for us all is Tyr. Him must we follow, ladies fair, we men, And for our wives and bairns and country dear, If so the Fates decree, give limb or life. So did god Tyr. So ever do the brave.

VII

"What noble shape, all-puissant, have we here? Puissant yet sad. The fourth day of the week. In honor of great Odin is it named: Father of gods and men; of heaven and earth

The ruler. E'en the realms beneath the earth. Where the grim goddess Hela doth pursue With lashes punitive, for all their crimes, The evil spirits of the underworld, His sway acknowledge; and old ocean's king. The green-haired Ægir, doth salute him lord. Only the pallid Norns do him defy. The sisters three of Fate, who sit far off, Outside of Time, and the beginning see Of all this earthly pageant and the end. Above the plains of Ida and the homes Of all the gods they dwell, these mystic ones, Spinning the thread of life, inscrutable. Of aspect beautiful, methinks, are they, And yet unpitying, suited to their task; For though with prayer and sacrifice we seek To turn them from their purpose, 'tis in vain — Nor man nor god can change their dread decrees. E'en as a maiden from the flax doth spin A golden thread and, for a moment's space, Gazes upon it, gently handling it, Then cuts the thread to its allotted length: So do these sisters three the thread of life Draw forth from out the unknown and, for a space Smiling upon it, cut it to its length.

But to this fair presentment let's return —
This figure of the father of the gods.
Upon his throne in Asgard here he sits,
Gazing, perchance, upon the world below.
He holds within his hand a mighty spear.
His ravens twain, Hugin and Munin wise,
Sedately perch upon the high-backed seat;
While on the floor his fierce and faithful wolves
Crouch, like great dogs, beside the monarch's feet.
A noble broidery this, fair demoiselles,
Well suited to the palace of a king.

VIII

"Red-bearded Thor, whose golden chariot leaps
From cloud to cloud, by goats impetuous drawn,
What time in guise of summer shower he comes,
While heaven re-echoes with his rumbling wheels
And trembles in affright the deluged earth —
Red-bearded Thor, girt with the belt of strength,
Wearing the gloves of steel wherewith he hurls
Miolnir, his mighty hammer, which returns
Ever when thrown, into its master's hand —
Red-bearded Thor, blustering but well-belov'd,
The idol of each Norseman's heart—to him
We give all honor on the week's fifth day!

Behold him now! See how he Miolnir throws! The lightning 'tis which from the swollen cloud Darts to the earth. Almost, methinks, we hear The roar and rumble of his chariot wheels.

IX

"What lovely shape is this? 'Tis Freya fair! She who in Greece was Aphrodite called — Venus in Rome. Goddess of Love is she, Sprung from the foam, child of the surging deeps, Forever young, forever beautiful! So we have her all other things are naught, Who doth bestow on men the joys of heaven. Behold her here, wearing that necklace rare Of diamonds fashioned by the mountain dwarfs! In this fair chariot, drawn by cats, she rides O'er all the world. The sixth day of the week To her is sacred. So these broideries say. But any day, methinks, we'd welcome her Who lights within our hearts the flame divine. What think you ladies? Ah, your blushes deep Disclose the hidden promptings of the soul.

X

"Old Saturn, eldest of the gods of Rome, Him have we last. To him the seventh day Is dedicated. Here we see him stand,
Holding within his hand a pruning knife,
Who first taught agriculture and the arts
In ancient Italy. The golden days
Were his when plenty filled the fruitful land
And war was not—the old Saturnian Age.
Roman, not Scandian, was this ancient god;
But he so well-beloved was, I trow,
That men cared never to forget his name."

ΧI

Earl Sigurd ceased. Then thus the fair Gudrun: "Thanks noble lord. So erudite thou art
We maids, sometimes, could scarcely follow thee.
Yet did we understand, as women do,
That what thou saidst was ever true and wise.
Thrice valued now these broideries fair will be
Since thou so eloquently hast rehearsed
The story and significance of each."

XII

To which Earl Sigurd, "Nay, my Princess, nay. Thou must not flatter me. Yet if to thee It seem that I have earned, by my discourse, Some favor at thy hands, I'll name it straight. What sayst thou to a ramble by old Rhine?

Never, since first I knew him, have appeared So beautiful his waters as this eve.

See how they shine, lit by the setting sun,
Which soon behind you mighty forest wall
Will disappear, bidding adieu to earth.

Soon falls the summer twilight on the world—
The magic summer twilight long and sweet.
The air is cool and pleasant. Wilt thou go?"

XIII

And smiled Gudrun and answered, "Aye, my lord."
And out across the meadows went the twain,
Leaving within the bower the damsels twelve.
And up the path beside the golden Rhine,
They wandered, while the day to twilight turned.
And overhead, among the branches, sang
The sweet-voiced birds their evening roundelays.

XIV

Sometimes, in this too fickle world, we see
A youth and maiden to their hearts' first choice
Constant, none other loving from that hour
When first they meet till death doth part them. So
Chances it now with Sigurd and Gudrun.
Love at first sight: true love without a break
Till death doth part them. Thus it is sometimes.

VI

IN THE ODENWALD

Ī

Now, as they hunted in the Odenwald One day, King Gunter to Earl Sigurd thus:

II

"Dost thou remember the adventure bold Whereof I spoke when first we met? Since then Naught of the matter have my lips disclosed To thee, though near my heart it lies; but now, To-day, as through the forest's depths we ride, Meseems my spirit would divulge itself. List to my tale and tell me then thy thought.

III

"Far off, in the great northern ocean, lies
A sacred island, Helgoland; of gods
And goddesses a trysting place; a haunt
Beloved of Odin. Here, upon a rock,
Circled by fire (so sing the ancient skalds),
Sleeps Brynhild, Odin's daughter fair, erstwhile

A valkyr, now, for some rash, wilful act
Of disobedience to her sire divine,
Condemned by him to everlasting sleep.
Yet did the All-Father this one daughter love
More than all other of his children. Woe
Filled, when he banished her, his mighty heart.
And thus he tempered, so, at least, 'tis said,
His mandate of perpetual slumber. If
Among earth's heroes could be found a man
Fearless enough and skilful to essay
Successfully the wall of fire and gain
The rock within, fair Brynhild should be his.
Thus runs the story, and for many a year
My heart hath brooded o'er it. Dost thou think,
Sigurd, 'tis true, or but a poet's dream?''

IV

And Sigurd answered: "Sire, methinks' tis true. Myself an hundred times have heard the tale. And in that seaport old, upon the coast Of Norroway, where I my galleys bought, A chart I saw which to an ancient man Belonged, who all his life upon the deep Had dwelt, half trader and half pirate red. A chart of that low region where the Rhine Empties, through many a mouth, into the sea; And Frisia's coast, with sandy isles befringed: And farther east, that land of fen and fiord Which, jutting into ocean, northward runs For many a misty league; (in shape, methinks, Like upcurled prow of some war-galley huge Breasting the North Sea's waves) that land yelept By Rome the Cimbric Chersonese, where dwell Angles and Jutlanders and Saxons bold. And on this chart was plotted Helgoland, The sacred island. He, himself, ofttimes, Slow-sailing by, (at least so, volubly, Maintained this ancient mariner) had beheld, Especially at night, the magic fire Circling the lonely cliff. And I the chart Purchased, thereafter, for a silver cup— Part of the Niblung's Hoard—and still possess. For ere I came to this Burgundian land My purpose 'twas to explore the sacred isle. Now, as thou knowest, except the lily maid Gudrun, no goddess fair do I desire."

V

At this the king smiled slightly, then went on:
"Oft hath my spirit longed to make the attempt,

And win the child of Odin for my bride.

Methinks her imprisoned soul aye beckons me
From out that ring of flame. But I—to leave
My kingdom and upon that wild emprise
To embark? To go upon a quest for what—
A maid? 'Tis passing difficult. Peoples bold—
Goths, Vandals, Franks—surround me. Far in the east,

Beside the Danube, gather the restless hordes
Of Attila the Hun, like tempest fierce
Soon to affright the earth. And in the south
Rome, slowly dying, lies; a lion old
Beset by hungry wolves; a conqueror once,
Defenseless now. War, everywhere 'tis war!
Is't not so, Sigurd? My duty lies at home;
At least, to me so seems it. To safeguard
His kingdom is the king's first task, and ne'er
Should private joys outweigh the public weal.
Alas, fair Brynhild, daughter of the gods,
Thou callst to me in vain! 'Tis but a dream!''

VI

Then Sigurd: "Sire, can I not serve thee? Well Thou knowest whate'er I can I'll gladly do."

VII

And Gunter answered: "Aye, if thou wilt, thou canst.

Thou, Sigurd, thou art free. Already thou Hast left thy father's land and roamst to and fro Unhampered. Like the eagle's thy strong flight No boundaries knows. Go thou upon the quest; I'll trust thee; and bring back the valkyr maid To Burgundy. Hagen I'll send along; In peril's hour, perchance, thy life he'll keep. A tower of strength thou'lt find him. For reward Take thou the lily maiden of our realm, Gudrun. Methinks thine eyes have found her fair. Two weddings will we have on thy return — Brynhild and Gunter, Sigurd and Gudrun. What sayest thou to my project, brother mine?"

VIII

And Sigurd, loath to leave Gudrun, but joyed
By this adventure bold to win his bride,
Answered: "'Tis a bargain. Straightway will I sail.

We'll go and come before the summer dies."

VII

THE VALKYR

I

Then Sigurd his three ships made ready; oars And sails were overhauled; a pennant gay, Wrought by the fingers of the fair Gudrun — A golden fleur-de-lis on field of blue -The Dragon's masthead graced; and for a cruise The fleet was victualed. Many a barrel stout Of ale and meal and salted beef and pork Beneath the thwarts was stowed; and water casks, Filled from the sparkling Rhine, were not forgot. And when all things were ready and the day Dawned brightly of departure came the king, With all his court, down to the river bank To say good-bye. And at the last there stood Together, in a little group apart, Gunter and Hagen, Sigurd and Gudrun. And Sigurd grasped King Gunter's hand and then, Before the eyes of all, stooping, he kissed, Upon her dewy lips, the sweet Gudrun —

Betrothèd lovers' parting kiss—a draught
Wherein, in equal quantities, are mixed
Sweetness and sorrow, bitterness and bliss.
Then Sigurd straightway sought his dragon ship,
And with him went the dark Burgundian knight,
Hagen, and on the after-deck they stood
Together, waving farewells to the shore.
And when, beyond her ken, the last dim sail
Had vanished, o'er the spirit of Gudrun
Black grief descended and, all desolate,—
Her life a world without its sun—she wept.

П

Then down the winding Rhine the little fleet,
Past lands of friends and foemen, made its way;
And, reaching open sea, the Frisian coast —
Low-lying, fringed with many a sandy isle —
Skirted (as by the ancient trader's chart Directed) and then left the land behind,
Northward and eastward steering, till at last,
Out of the level ocean Sigurd saw
The red cliffs of the sacred island rise.
And on the island's top a ring of flame
Burned, by the hand of Odin lit, and here,
Within that fiery ring, so sang the skald,

Upon a rock, the valkyr, Brynhild, slept.
And Sigurd on the sandy spit below
His galleys beached and then, ere nightfall, bade
His mariners their evening meal prepare.

Ш

Now when the early summer sun its beams
Cast o'er the sea and dyed to deeper red
The ruddy cliffs of Helgoland uprose
Sigurd and Hagen and, upon the sands
Leaving the busy, bustling crews, essayed
The steep ascent to Brynhild's rocky bower.
Sheer from the sea on every side upsprang
This island height, but Sigurd found a path,
Unseen at first, which, starting from the beach,
In many a zigzag, to the summit clomb;
And up this path he, leading, made his way.
But Hagen, heavy and of foot unsure,
Though long he strove, at last, from very fear
Of loss of limb or life, gave up the attempt,
And all chagrined, sat down upon the sand.

IV

Now as he neared the summit a gray cloud Enveloped Sigurd and with slower steps He clambered till, all suddenly, he beheld,

Barring his pathway, lurid in the mist, The wall of fire which girt the valkyr maid. And as he for a moment paused a shape Unearthly close beside him he perceived; A shape seen once before by him, what time, In the deep forest, Fafnir's lair he sought; A shape one-eyed and huge, with great slouched hat Topping its golden locks, and a blue cloak Covering its shoulders. Odin 'twas, in truth: Odin, All-Father, watching o'er his child. Thus then the god: "Whither away, my lad? What seekst thou on this hilltop?" And to him Sigurd replied: "The valkyr maid I seek, Brynhild, whom on this rocky island-height, Girt by a wall of living fire, thy hand Hath prisoned!" Then the god Valhallan thus: "Woe-woe she'll bring thee, Sigurd. Would that I Power had to stop thee, but the mystic Norns Have willed it, and no man escapes his fate. Woe brings the valkyr maiden—woe and death!" But Sigurd: "Unto Gunter have I pledged My word. I've sworn to fetch the maiden back." Then Odin: "Aye, the hour foretold hath come. 'Tis written in the book of Fate that thou, And thou alone, shouldst set the maiden free.

Go on, my lad. Thy promise keep. What comes Must come. You wall of magic fire which lifts So terribly its forked crest and bars Against all other men this mountain top Thee cannot harm. Fear not, my lad. Farewell!" With that he vanished. Then into the flame Plunged Sigurd, sword in hand, and from the flame Issued, upon the other side, unscathed.

V

Now when into that silent spot—that isle
By fiery billows girt—had Sigurd come
His eyes beheld, within a craggy niche,
O'er which an ancient pine-tree sentry stood,
The figure of the valkyr maiden couched
Upon a moss-grown rock. Closed were her eyes
As if in sleep; her tresses beautiful
From underneath her wingèd helmet fled
Adown the mossy pillow; her long shield
Covered her body; and her valkyr spear
Beside her rested. Motionless she lay
As in some stately mausoleum lies
A sculptured form of marble. Thus, for years
Unnumbered had she slept, by Odin's power
Preserved from perils of the earth and air—

Fair daughter of the father of the gods.

And Sigurd, lifting up the shield, beheld

A maiden-form in snow-white samite gowned,
But bodiced in a warrior's byrnie bright.

And, for a time, all motionless he stood,
Gazing upon the sight, and in his mind

What next to do revolving. Then beside

The moss-grown rock falling upon one knee—

E'en as 'twas written in the book of Fate—

He kissed the cold lips of the valkyr maid.

VI

As, at the kiss of spring-time, open wide
The violet's eyes, so now, at Sigurd's kiss,
Opened the blue eyes of the valkyr maid:
And as, in April, through all nature runs
New life and warmth, and sleeping earth awakes,
So now, through Brynhild's sleeping form new life
Surged warm and, like sweet April, she awoke.

VII

"Who art thou that above me bendest? Naught Remember I since to this lonely isle My father Odin brought me, and with fire Begirt the rocky couch whereon I lay.

Who art thou? And whence comest thou? Answer me!"

VIII

Thus spake the valkyr maiden; and to her Sigurd replied: "My name is Sigurd. Thee I sought that I might bear thee to the land Of the Burgundians. Gunter waits thee there. A noble king doth crave thee for his bride."

IX

"And hast thou, then, a bride already?" Thus Brynhild. And Sigurd answered: "Nay, fair maid,
No bride have I. Yet do I hope, ere long,
A bride to claim. When thou dost Gunter wed,
On that same day weds Gunter's sister me:
Gudrun, the lily maid of Burgundy."

X

This hearing, from her couch the valkyr rose And, leaving spear and shield behind her, passed From out the grotto—silent—pale—and stood A little space away. Then thus she spoke:

XI

"And hath it come to this? Alas! Alas! Must I, a daughter of the mighty gods, Be wedded to this mortal who, although A king he calls himself, is but a churl To me? O, father Odin, was my fault So grievous? Have I not enough atoned? My punishment is more than I can bear!"

XII

So saying, in her hands she bowed her head, Crowned by the wingèd helmet, and with tears Bitter bewailed her miserable lot.

XIII

Then Sigurd gently to the maiden spoke:
"Weep not, sweet lady. 'Tis the way of life.
What man is free? What woman? All are slaves.
Are not the mighty gods, e'en like ourselves,
Bound by the chains of Fate? In Odin's heart
Reigns not deep ceaseless sorrow? Aye, my girl.
If he, thy father, to this lot consigned
His best-beloved daughter 'twas because
Unto his eyes no other way appeared.
Brynhild, weep not, but drink the cup which Fate
Sets to thy lips and, though it be bitter, smile

And make the most of life. Unto us all,

Both gods and men, 'tis mystery. Come, sweet maid.

Far from this lonely mountain summit, down Into the world, we'll go, and thou, once more, Shalt live, e'en though within a lowlier sphere Confined. Behold, the magic fire is dead Which erstwhile girt thee round, and from this cliff Thine eyes can see my galleys on the beach. Soon in the deep blue water will they ride Once more, as toward the fair Burgundian shores Brynhild they bear. And in that alien land, Whate'er betide thee, thy unfaltering friend, True as the magnet to the steel, I'll be. Come, Brynhild, come. Forget thy valkyr life. Or, rather, forget not, but let it be A golden memory which, like a fair lamp, Shall light thy soul in many a dreary hour. And in that future vast toward which we move— Of which, e'en now, we are a part—perchance Thou to those higher regions shalt return, And of that freer life once more partake;— A valkyr, bearing to Valhalla's halls, With tender, ministering hands, the souls Of heroes in their earthly fight o'erwhelmed."

XIV

"Like Bragi dost thou speak; like Bragi, god Of eloquence and poetry and song. Methinks, some day, thou wilt be one of those Who sit around my father Odin's board."

XV

Thus Brynhild; and to her Sigurd replied:
"Perchance, then, in that life to come, amidst
Valhalla's glories, once more will we meet.
But, whatsoe'er the future brings, thy path
To-day leads toward the Rhine. Is it not so?
Believe me, Brynhild, there's no other way."

XVI

She bowed assent; and down the ruddy cliffs,
Each ever and anon the other's hand
Clasping, they went; he out into the world
Unknown that haughty spirit leading, once
A valkyr, now a woman. And within
The cabin of the Dragon (which, betimes,
E'en by Gudrun's deft hands, had been prepared
For this fair guest, with tapestries all hung,
And stored with gowns and gems such as befit
A maiden's bower) he placed her, and himself

And Hagen on the after-deck above, Out where the winds and waters sang, abode.

XVII

Then o'er the deep the Dragon led the way,
The Wolf and Bear close following, and astern —
Bereft henceforward of their crown of fire —
Faded the ruddy cliffs of Helgoland.

VIII SIGURD AND GUNTER

Ι

"Now comes once more the ancient feast of Yule, Now comes once more that joyous festival Which men, from immemorial time, have held Supreme, above all others taking rank, And justly, so it ever seemed to me. For what is it we celebrate? Is't not A heavenly circumstance of import high All slighter things transcending? Is it not The time when the great Sun, the wheel of fire, The source of light and life and all that is, The golden symbol of All-Father's eye, Ceases henceforward to withdraw himself (Each daily visit briefer than the last) And, turning in his course, all reconciled, Comes back to earth with ever-lengthening strides:-With outstretched arms and kindly-beaming face Comes back once more to earth, in darkness wrapt Perpetual but for him; darkness like that

Which in the shadowy halls of Hela reigns — Pale goddess subterrene, whose realms receive The souls of the unrighteous after death? Aye, this it is we celebrate; this hour Supreme, with brightest consequences fraught. A season for rejoicing, then, is Yule; A season, therefore, so it seems to me, Well-fitted for our nuptials. What thinkst thou?"

П

Thus Gunter, King of the Burgundians, spoke To Sigurd as, within a spacious room Of that old Roman palace by the Rhine, Beside a fire of mighty logs, they stood.

Ш

And Sigurd answered: "Sire, betrothed am I To thy fair sister and, like lovers all, Too soon for me the happy wedding day, E'en though it were to-morrow, cannot come."

IV

To whom then Gunter thus, whose cloudy brow Bespoke the troubled soul which dwelt within:

"Like thine is my desire, and 'twas my plan To celebrate our nuptials, thine and mine, Close-following the return from Helgoland. But ever more the haughty valkyr maid. With this and that excuse, hath put me off, Till 'nay,' at last, no longer could she speak, And hath at Yule-tide promised to me mine. Methinks, sometimes, she loves me not; and yet Her deeply do I love. My brightest dreams Of what she'd be, compared with what she is, Were like the frescoed figure on the wall Matched with the beauty of the living maid; And for the hour which makes us one I long. And yet, if she doth love me not, what good? 'Tis but the shadow that I clasp; 'tis but The garment of the soul, however fair, That mine becomes: the substance hath escaped.

Would that her valkyr spirit I could win,
And merge her life with mine! But, ah, to love
Brings not love in return, and marble-cold
Meseems she stands—far, far beyond my reach.
Alas, the poorest swain who ploughs the earth,
Or sails the sea, and holds some woman's heart
All, all his own, is happier far than I."

V

He ceased and gazing out upon the Rhine Remained, all silent, for a little space,
Then spoke again: "Nathless our wedding day We'll celebrate, my Sigurd, thou and I:
Perchance with better knowledge of her spouse Brynhild may love me better. As for thee Already art thou sun and moon and stars
And heaven's transcendent brightness to Gudrun."

IX

YULE-TIDE AT THE COURT OF KING GUNTER

(Including the Song of Olaf the Red)

I

Yule-tide! And in King Gunter's palace reigns Revelry such as ne'er before was seen, By oldest graybeard, in all Burgundy! For is it not the hour auspicious, set E'en by the merry-hearted king himself. When here have met, from far and near, the guests To celebrate, with feasting and with song, After the manner of the olden time. The double wedding? Is it not the hour Blest by the presence of all-knowing Var, Goddess of marriage, who to lovers' vows Listens attentive, and who broken troth Doth ever punish? Is it not the hour Dedicate not alone to love's delights But also to the gayeties of Yule — Mad, merry Yule? Let laughter unconfined Reign, therefore, and illimitable joy!

 \mathbf{II}

Now are the guests all gathered in the hall, Which almost like the greenwood doth appear, With holly hung and sacred mistletoe.

Now ready are the harpers with their harps, And lighted are the mighty logs of Yule.

Now, wreathed in green, an apple in his mouth, As ancient custom bids, and borne aloft By lackeys tall, the smoking Boar's Head comes.

Ш

Upon the dais, with the merry court
To right and left, and guests resplendent, sat
Gunter and Brynhild, Sigurd and Gudrun.
Brightly upon the finger of each bride
Sparkled the wedding-ring; on Brynhild's brow,
Marking before the world her queenly state,
Glittered a golden crown with diamonds set;
And round the white neck of Gudrun, the gift
Of Sigurd, hung a string of lustrous pearls,
Precious beyond compare, chief ornament
Of the dark Niblung's Hoard. As mariner
Watches, by night, the Cynosure, his eyes
Ever to it returning, so all eyes
In that great hall the bridal-party watched;

Ever returning, irresistibly Drawn from all other things of lesser note, To dwell upon that constellation bright.

IV

Below, at the great table, filled with cheer, Which ran the whole length of the mighty hall From door to dais, Gunter's men-at-arms Feasted with merry din; and them among, Each tar between two spearmen, that the guest Might want for nothing, Sigurd's vikings sat. E'en thus, upon that memorable night When first they met, six months ago, they sat, In golden summer when the days were long. And round and round the mighty drinking-horns Passed with the nut-brown ale or sparkling mead, Passed, with their precious freight, from lip to lip, Ever to be replenished and repass, Filled from great casks within the cellar stored. And Norseman and Burgundian drank "Washael!"

Each to the other, and ere the bearded lips
Were dry, "Skoel to the viking!" and again
"Prosit!" and mellow friendship ruled the hour,
For Bacchus doth make brothers of us all.

And in the middle of the wassail, lo! Twelve harpers good, beside the dais stair Stationed, where all could hear their symphonies. Struck string and, to their music keeping step, Entered King Momus, from a hidden door Issuing upon the hall—Lord of Misrule— Followed apace by all his motley crew. And some—like Momus, sovereign lord, himself— Were masked and others like the foolish clown Painted who to this day, at merry Yule, Disports with columbine and harlequin. And round and round the mighty hall they went. As mummers will, with all extravagance; These marching with a mock solemnity, Those—men and maidens in apparel gay — Their skill terpsichorean setting forth In pantomimic dance fantastical, And others yet to wake the mirthful laugh Seeking with antics of the primal fool— Horse-play and somersaults, coarse mimicry, Tooting of horns and many another trick Ancient as is the zany's ancient art. And when, at last, it seemed that long enough Had folly and unreason gross held sway, Gunter a signal gave, and the twelve skalds

Their music ceased. And as a fair jet d'eau, Rising from sculptured fountain high in air, Suddenly falls when cut off is the stream, So, suddenly, when the music ended, ceased The hurly-burly in King Gunter's hall. And at the oaken board old Momus found A vacant place, and of his mummers some Beside him perched and others round about Or sat or lay upon the rush-strewn floor.

V

Then, at the bidding of the king, stept forth, With harp in hand, from out the throng of skalds, An ancient bard, Olaf the Red yclept, Who had with Sigurd from the Northland come. White were his locks as those of Hoder old, Though ruddy as the beard of Thor they'd been In younger days, when he his surname got. Noble his bearing. One of those was he Who voice the passions of the human heart, Or paint the deeds of the heroic past. One of that gifted company (although Naught but a lowly neophyte) to which Belong great Homer and the Mantuan bard Illustrious, high priests of the epic muse.

Oft in the presence of the enemy's fleet
His battle song he'd sung, or at the feasts
Of kings chanted adventures wild and weird.
Of gods and goddesses to-night he sang,
And chiefly of that valiant deity
Who ever with the mountain giants fought—
Bluff Thor, the idol of all Scandian hearts.

(The Song of Olaf the Red)

VI

Thus ran his song. Once did the green-haired god

Who dwells within the illimitable deep,
Ægir, prepare a banquet for the gods
Whose home is highest heaven; and to the halls
Of ocean came, a glorious company,
Upon the day appointed for the event,
The mighty ones of Asgard. Round the board
Of Ægir now they sit, those peerless ones,
Drinking the nut-brown ale and foaming mead.
Behold, upon the right hand of the host,
Odin enthroned, father of gods and men,
Ruler of heaven and earth, whose will is law
Through all the vast expanse save when athwart

The purposes it runs of the pale Norns, The sisters three inscrutable who sit Beside the ash-tree Ygdrasil and hold Within their hands the thread of every life: The sisters three of Fate unchangeable — The Past, the Present and the Future—Urd. Verdandi, Skuld—them—them alone he dreads: The mystic ones who sit above the gods, And the beginning and the end behold Of all created things. Pleasure to-day Lights the All-Father's visage, where doth dwell Sadness too often, sadness at the lot Of human kind. Gracious his mien divine, As in the halls of Ægir now he sits, Amongst the gods and goddesses, his mead Nectarean drinking, and ever and anon Feeding with morsels from the banquet board His ravens twain, Hugin and Munin, who Him tidings bring from earth's remotest parts, Or bear his mandate to contending hosts. Upon the high back of their master's chair Now rest these sable messengers, while crouch About the monarch's feet, like faithful dogs, The two gray wolves who ever him attend. Them likewise doth he feed with morsels rare.

VII

Beside the wise All-Father Frigga sits,
His spouse and queen, goddess of wedded love,
Of spotless chastity, and motherhood,
And all the sacred virtues of the home.
Stern guardian of the marriage bond is she,
And oft her voice upbraiding Odin hears,
For hard it is Frigga to always please.
Nathless no hypocrite is Odin's queen.
A virtuous wife she dwells beside her lord,
And in her life exemplifies her words.

VIII

Next to his mother Frigga now behold
Bright Balder; he of all the mighty gods
The best-beloved and most beautiful.
God of the Sun, lord of the summer-time,
The source of light and life and all things fair,
Who doth not Balder love? In all this world,
So sang the ancient skalds, naught could be found,
Nor man, nor beast, nor bird, nor stock, nor stone,
That loved not Balder: naught save one small shrub,
The mistletoe yclept; and with a twig
From this ill-fated plant, thrown by the hand
Of Hoder blind (whom Loki's wicked spleen

Trickt to the deed) was beauteous Balder slain.

Yet doth he rise each year from Hela's gloom,
Renewed, immortal, glorious as of old,
God of the summer sunshine evermore.

Close by his side the gentle Nanna sits,
His faithful spouse who, when bright Balder died,
Herself—who did subsist upon his love—
Perished of sorrow inconsolable.

Yet like her lord from Hela doth she rise,
What time the golden spring returns to earth,
Holp from those gloomy depths by his strong arm.

IX

Tyr next we see, the one-armed god of war,
His missing limb by the fierce Fenris wolf
Torn from his body. For when the Asgard gods
Sought to securely bind the Fenris Wolf—
(Which is a symbol of devouring fire,
All-devastating, uncontrollable)
Ne'er would he stand at rest unless a god,
As pledge of fair intent, would place his arm
Betwixt the creature's jaws. This then did Tyr.
But when the wolf, betrayed and bound at last,
His fate perceived he, in revengeful rage,
Tyr's arm tore off below the elbow joint.

Thus Tyr, to save the world, gave up his arm, And if 'twere needful, would have given his life, As ever have the brave, or gods or men, Done, without question, for the common-weal.

X

Here likewise Loki sits, the god perverse. The mischief-maker sly, the evil one. Scoffer at all things by the gods held good, Father of lies, of wickedness the source. If trouble came 'twas ever Loki's fault, If discord rose false Loki was the cause. Evil to him seemed good, and what the gods Eschewed as wicked aye was his delight, So full of all perverseness was his heart. Him did the gods of Asgard for a while Suffer to roam at will through earth and heaven, But came a time when e'en the All-Father wise Lost patience with his son and to a rock Fast chained him, with a viper overhead, Which ever dropt its poison on his breast. But who so wicked that no woman's heart He hath to love him? None—nor man nor god. And to the rock with Loki went his wife Siguna, and beside him ever sits,

Catching the viper's poison in a cup, Ere on her husband's naked breast it falls.

XI

And here, a deity benign, sits Frey,

To whom the Scandian farmer ever prays

For plenteous crops; who rain and sunshine sends,

Each as 'tis needed, and propitious airs, And at the last a harvest bountiful. The son of Niord, an ancient ocean god, Who ruled the coasts as Ægir ruled the deep, Was Frey, and fair his sister as himself, Freya, ave fairer, for in heaven or earth What lovelier thing than Freya doth exist, Goddess of youth and beauty and of love? Behold them sitting now in Ægir's hall, Freya and Frey, the children beautiful Whom Niord unto the gods of Asgard gave! As in a brooch a pearl of ocean shines Among a score of gems (though past all price These others be, yet none is like the pearl In lustre soft and milk-white loveliness) So doth this daughter of the ocean god, This foam-sprung Aphrodite of the north,

Among the mighty ones of Asgard shine, Forever young, forever beautiful.

XII

And here, long-bearded, like the bard who tells This tale to-night in Gunter's palace, sits Bragi, of song and eloquence the god. A wondrous harp within his hand he holds, And ofttimes to the gods and goddesses He sings, and of all skalds the best is he. Next to him sits his spouse, Iduna fair, She who the apples of immortal life Doth keep. For when the gods and goddesses Aweary are, and feel the hand of Time Bearing upon them, straightway do they seek That garden where Iduna's apples grow, Which having eaten, youth returns again. So wondrous potent is the golden fruit.

XIII

Here likewise Vidar sits, the silent one, Who doth the deep primeval forest love. Seldom among the gods to banquet board He comes, but in the impenetrable wood Abides by preference; and when in the halls Of Asgard, or on Ida's flowery plain,
At times, he shows, always an air he hath
Distrait, as though within the silent wood,
Rather than in the glittering palaces
Among the Asas bright, he longed to be.
But Ægir doth he love, and to the feast
Of ocean's god hath come—a happy guest—
And in his rightful place he sits to-day.

XIV

And ancient Hoenir likewise here doth sit,
And Vali strong, and wise Forseti, god
Of justice, who all rulers doth inspire
That seek his aid; lies cannot them deceive,
But even-handed justice they dispense;
And Heimdal, keeper of the rainbow bridge
O'er which the gods and goddesses to earth
Descend and, when their missions are fulfilled,
Ascend, a bright procession, to the skies;
And Hoder blind, that god unfortunate
Who, trickt by Loki's mischief-making guile,
The beauteous Balder slew; and Hermod swift,
Who to the gloomy gates of Hela's realm
Descended, and that goddess importuned,
For many days, bright Balder to release,

But no—all unavailing was his quest;
And Rinda, goddess of the wintry earth;
And Uller, bowman famous, who to hunt
On snow-shoes o'er the white snow-surface loves.
These and yet other gods and goddesses
Of rank distinguished, now within the halls
Of Ægir sit—a glorious company.

XV

Last but not least, here sits the Thunder-God, Impetuous, fierce, yet kind of heart withal; The hero of a hundred cherished tales Told by the saga-man in smoky hall, Or chanted by the bard at banquet board, Or crooned by Norseland mother to her child; Here now he sits who with the giants huge Doth ever love to fight, and goblins fierce; Red-bearded Thor, of all the many sons Of Odin, nearest to the Norseman's heart.

XVI

Now in the middle of the mighty feast,
As round and round the foaming horns of ale
Were passing, and in every heart joy reigned,
The green-haired Ægir thus addressed his guests.

XVII

"Vast are my stores of mead and ale and none Has ever from my table thirsty gone,
But I of something better far have heard
Than these great horns which, fix it as we may,
Ever and ever must replenished be.
Something it is, in truth, most wonderful,
Not understandable the thing by me,
And yet assured am I it doth exist."

XVIII

He paused a moment; on the ancient god All eyes were turned; then slowly he went on.

XIX

"What say ye, Asas, to a wondrous cup,
Which none can drain, made by the cunning dwarfs
Who dwell within the bowels of the earth?
A vessel from whose depths the fragrant ale
Forever issues, foaming like a force?
A magic goblet which nor man nor god
Nor mountain giant horrible and huge
Can empty, though from eve to morn he drink,
And then again from morn till dusky eve?
What say ye, Asas, to a cup like this?"

XX

His emerald locks the King of Ocean shook, Smiled to himself and then again went on.

XXI

"Far in the north 'tis held, this magic cup.
And would ye know, ye gods and goddesses,
Who dwell in heaven, and tread the flowery plains
Of Ida, and upon the rainbow bridge
Descend, a bright procession, or ascend,
And drink the mead of Odin, would ye know
What churl profane hath gotten this rare prize?
Old Skrymer, of the mountain giants king!
By him and them and all their kin 'tis used —
A jewel bright within the snouts of swine.
By heavens! Old though I be, I've often thought
Myself would some day strive, by craft or force,
To get possession of this wondrous cup.
What think ye, Asas? 'Twere a glorious deed."

XXII

Intently listened all. Then from his seat Uprose the thunder-god—red-bearded Thor—And thus, with many a fiery gesture, spake.

XXIII

"To me belongs this deed. To me who aye Have fought with giants and hobgoblins fierce! Their tricks I know: their deep deceptive ways. 'Tis ever my delight to harass them. Therefore if me the All-Father will permit, Straightway, ye gods, I'll go upon this quest."

XXIV

He ceased, and thus the king of gods and men.
"Brave words are these, my Thor; brave words,
my son.

But ever thou wast daring, and a deed Like this did ever to thy heart appeal. Go. Smite the giants, and bring back the cup."

XXV

Then from the banquet of the gods went forth Red-bearded Thor, blustering and full of wrath. Miolner he seized; and soon his golden car Leaped to the clouds, by goats impetuous drawn. His hammer first to right and then to left He hurled in fierce delight; his chariot wheels Rumbled amidst the clouds; and from the plain The sons of men beheld the storm rush by. So went god Thor against his giant foes.

XXVI

Now northward and yet northward sped the god
Until at last the utmost boreal point
Of Scandian land he reached—that wedge-like cape
Which juts into the lonely polar sea.
And here, within a subterranean hall
Enormous, many a rood in length and breadth,
The giant Skrymer dwelt. Into that hall
Strode, all impetuous, the thunder-god,
Miolner in hand. Here, at a table long,
The giants sat, old Skrymer at its head.
To whom god Thor, with crafty, flattering words.

XXVII

"Hail Skrymer, of the mountain giants king!
(For that I now behold that monarch great
Of whose brave deeds my ears have ofttimes heard
I cannot doubt.) Hail all ye courtiers fair!
Upon a quest of import high I come,
Commissioned by the father of the gods,
Odin, than whom no greater name exists
In heaven or earth or Hela's realms below:
A quest of import but most difficult,
And therefore your assistance now I crave.
A wondrous cup I seek which, so 'tis said,

No god can empty though from eve to morn He drink, and then again from morn till eve. No god can empty it, and yet, methinks, 'Twould be an easy task for one of you, For giants in a mightier mould are made."

XXVIII

He ceased: o'er Skrymer's visage crept a smile As to the fulsome flattery of the god He listened: then the giant thus replied,

XXIX

"Welcome art thou, O Thor, to giant land!
Welcome to this, our banquet hall! The cup
Which none can empty, and which now thou seekst,
Mine eyes have seen. Yea, from its brim my lips
Have drank the magic ale which bubbles forth.
But let's of that hereafter. Sit thee down
Among us, and be merry with the rest,
Drinking the liquor which ourselves have brewed.
None better comes, e'en from the enchanted cup."

XXX

So saying, to a place at his right hand He motioned, and ere little time had passed God Thor was feasting with his giant foes.

XXXI

Now when their fill this glorious company
Had drank and eaten, Skrymer thus addressed
His Asa guest. "Some feats of strength and skill,
To while away the night, we ofttimes have.
What sayst thou, Thor? Thou art the honored guest.
Thyself, therefore, must have the premier trial.
Here is a cup filled to the brim with ale.
Do thou now empty it. A test it is
Of manhood with us giants. At one draught
Most of us drain it, but in two, at most,
The weakest of our band can finish it."

XXXII

With smile of confidence the Asa took
The cup within his hands, then to his lips
Placed it, and with a mighty effort drank,
Seeking in one long draught to empty it.
But though he drank till all his breath was gone
Scarce had the liquor sank below the brim.

XXXIII

Old Skrymer smiled. "Methinks our honored guest Two drinks will need in which to drain the cup. Nay, do not be discouraged. Try again."

XXXIV

But though again and yet again he strove, The god of thunder could not drain the cup. Nay, scarce the liquor sank below the brim.

XXXV

Then Skrymer thus: "Perchance some other feat The god can better do—some easier thing. A black cat have we here. Methinks to lift This cat from off the floor were no hard task."

XXXVI

Crestfallen Thor the cat essayed to lift.

But though he strove with all his might and main,

Barely to move one foot from off the floor

Took all the strength he had. Strange did it seem.

XXXVII

Then Skrymer smiled, and once again he spoke. "Much have I heard of Asa Thor—his strength, His reckless courage and his wondrous deeds, And yet some little feat, such as a child Were equal to, he cannot now perform. Methinks his prowess has been overpraised.

However, one more trial of strength we'll have — Perchance his reputation he'll retrieve.

Come hither, nurse, and with this god contend.

A wrestling match we'll have. Methinks in this — A noble sport,—our guest doth all excel."

XXXVIII

As thus he spoke a pale and withered hag
Hobbled across the hall and grappling Thor
Within her arms (though with all strength the god Struggled to free himself from her embrace)
Lifted him from his feet. Then to the floor
Tost him, as though a feather in her hands.

XXXXIX

Loud laughed the giants all. But Skrymer led Back to his seat the god. "No more we'll mar, With these rough tricks, our hospitality. Come, brothers, to this Asa brave let's drink Good health and happiness; and may he bear To all who dwell in Asgard's shining halls, And on the flowery plains of Ida meet For interchange of thought and converse wise, Best wishes from the giants of the north."

XL

Now when it came Thor's time to go uprose All those huge giants and did him salute. (Three times the height of mortal men they stand) But Skrymer out into the open air — Where waited for the god his goat-drawn car — Passed with him and, when guite alone they were, Thus spoke. "Be not down-hearted, Asa Thor, That in those feats such showing poor thou madest. In truth, 'twas all enchantment. The gold cup Thou couldst not empty, from the mighty deep Its liquor drew (though changed to foaming ale Was this by witchcraft) and when thou didst drink The sea ran backward from the sandy shore E'en as the tide doth ebb, and on the beach The graybeards stood, watching in wonderment That ocean thus, all out of time, should ebb. The cat thou soughtst to lift was not a cat, But the great Midgard Serpent who beneath The illimitable ocean ever dreams. To wake not till the Day of Ragnorok; And when one paw thy Asa strength did lift, Methough the ending of all things had come. And the beshriveled hag who threw thee down, Dost think she was a common beldame? Nay.

Old Age she was, who conquers every one.
Well, therefore, Thor, didst thou acquit thyself,
Almost to accomplish the impossible.
Lives not, in earth or heaven, a braver soul.
And, as a mark of my sincere regard,
This magic goblet, from whose depths the ale
Forever flows, on thee I now bestow.
Already in the banquet hall thy lips
Have proved its wondrous capabilities."

XLI

So saying, in the hands of Thor he placed The magic cup; but ere the astonished god Could voice his thanks, old Skrymer in the air Had vanished, for in all illusions strange, And every kind of witchcraft was he wise.

XLII

Then to his golden car the thunder-god
Turned, and re-entered, and his restless goats
Swift-mounted to the clouds, as toward the hall
Of Ægir now the happy Asa sped,
Bearing within his hands the magic cup.

(End of the Song of Olaf the Red)

XLIII

The minstrel ceased, and through the banquet hall Rang mighty plaudits of the voice and hand. And when the din had somewhat slackened rose King Gunter from his seat beside his bride, High on the dais, and with words of praise Olaf saluted, and a purse of gold Likewise bestowed upon the famous bard. Then round the board the horns of nut-brown ale Resumed their journey, and the mighty logs Brighter and ever brighter blazed. The night Moved onward with a joyous majesty. E'en like Valhalla seemed the glittering scene — That glorious hall above where, after death, The heroes feast among the immortal gods.

XLIV

Thus flourished Yule-tide at King Gunter's court.
And thus the double wedding, with all pomp,
Was celebrated. Surely 'twas a time
For laughter and illimitable joy —
A marriage feast, a feast of Yule, in one.

X

IN THE GARDEN

I

Now northward once more comes the Sun, from climes

Austral returning to the German land,
And straight before his glorious presence flee
Darkness and cold as, with a bounteous hand,
Light he dispenses—vivifying light—
And balmy winds, and ever-lengthening days.
And as, in Roman triumph, at the front
Of the long line the conqueror rides, and him
Fair captive maidens follow, crown'd with flowers,
So now, as up the heavenly highway rides
Balder triumphant, in his train appears
Bright Easter, goddess of the spring, by troupes
Of sunny hours accompanied—maidens fair,
Nymphs of the golden spring-time, such as wake
The hearts of men to ecstasy—with flowers
Bedecked and followed by melodious birds.

So rises Balder out of Hela's shades — Immortal, glorious—bringing back to earth Light, life and all we love. So follow him, Year after year, dear to the hearts of men, The spirits of the spring-time jubilant — Easter and all her nymphs—a pageant fair!

П

Within her garden, at the sunset hour, Queen Brynhild sat; but on her spirit fell, Well-nigh unheeded, all the charms of spring. The soft caresses of the balmy breeze, The upturned faces of the early flowers, The voices sweet of the returning birds, None, none could pierce the armor of her gloom. E'en as a mourner gazing on some show Beholds it not, or only half beholds, Conscious but dimly of the spectacle, So Brynhild gazed upon the earth and sky. Bitter her soul, brooding upon its wrong, Ever rebelling against fate's decree. And as, encompassed by her mood, she sat, To her King Gunter, through the palace grounds Slow wandering with his dogs at close of day, Came and, half chidingly, thus her addressed.

III

"Brynhild, my queen, why dost thou ever sit
Alone? Why dost thou ever seek the spot
Where none assemble? Queens should gracious be,
Shining, like the resplendent sun, for all;
Not leading lives recluse, like cloistered nuns,
Unseen of men. Lovest thou not the gay court,
With all its joys? Lovest thou not Burgundy,
Our beauteous land? Lovest thou not me, its king?"

IV

Thus Gunter: to the valkyr's eyes a light
Leaped like a sword flashing from out its sheath:
Then, rising to her feet, she spoke: "What use
Longer to play a part? I love thee not;
Thee nor thy court nor Burgundy. A trick,
Abhorred of Odin, gave me to thy arms.
Rather upon that mountain would I sleep
Once more, where long I slept, begirt by fire,
Far in the northern seas, than be thy queen!
Methinks ofttimes upon that lonely isle,
With helmet bowed, my father Odin sits,
Grieving upon his erring daughter's fate.
O would that I could see once more his face,

E'en though by wrath and sorrow clouded o'er! See as I saw it when, with waving spear, He cast the spell about me, and the flames Commanded to protect me from all harm! Happier my heart to be by him condemned Than by the ignoble Gunter to be praised!"

V

Thus Brynhild: then, like some long pent-up flood Bursting, at last, its barriers strong, went on: "I love thee not! Art thou the hero bright My father Odin dreamt of when he girt My rocky couch with fire and sought thereby To save me from all men of common clay? Art thou the mortal for a goddess meet? Art thou the viking bold who sailed the seas, Seeking the sacred isle of Helgoland, And climbed the dizzy cliff, and through the flame Plunged, and the spell dissolved which held me fast? To him do I belong, and not to thee, Ingloriously waiting by the Rhine! For him was I intended. Thus 'twas planned By the immortal father of the gods. But o'er the gods the mystic sisters sit, Spinning the thread of Fate; the sisters three,

All potent, cruel; Urd, Verdandi, Skuld.
And jealous of my beauty and my power
Were they (at least, such is my thought) and sought
Me to abase who in Valhalla's halls
Once shone more lovely than fair Freya's self,
And dwelt supreme in the All-Father's heart.
Alas! most treacherously have the dread Norns
Dealt by me, and the purpose merciful
Of Odin,—to preserve me from the worst,—
Thwarted. The weakling Gunter have I got;
I who was meant for Sigurd. Alas! Alas!"

VI

"Lovest thou then Sigurd?" Thus the king; and

Answered the valkyr, haughty was her mien. "No man I love; but of all earthly men Sigurd, the son of Sigmund, is the best; And like bright Balder in the east doth shine Eclipsing with his light the puny stars."

VII

[&]quot;Thou lovest Sigurd! Aye!" King Gunter gasped.

[&]quot;Fool, that mine eyes discerned it not before!"

VIII

So saying, (like a wounded man who strives
Steadily to walk, but staggers in his gait,
Stunned by the shock, and faint from loss of blood,)
King Gunter from the fatal garden passed.
And, as he slowly trod, once round he turned
And, looking backward wistfully, beheld,
Lit by the last rays of the setting sun,
Her face within her hands, as if she wept,
Brynhild the valkyr, standing motionless.

XI

GUNTER'S SOLILOQUY

I

"Before me in the rocky isle he was,
Before me in the valkyr's stormy heart.
Methinks I see it all. E'en as the sun,
Risen, doth illumine with his light a road
Wherein by night we walked in darkness dense,
And looking back with unobstructed eyes
Clearly we see that road, so have her words
Illumed the path wherein I long have trod.
Fool! Purblind, blundering fool! By the dark clouds

Of egotism enwrapped and vain conceit,
Seeing not what to all other eyes was plain.
She loves him; she hath loved him from the first;
And I, the king, am naught. Aye, worse than naught;

Stupidly standing, a poor loathsome thing, Ever between her heart and its desire. Yet do I blame them not. The fault was mine, If fault it can be called to harbor love,
Which comes unbidden and at his own will
Departs. A boy capricious, as the bards
Of Greece and Rome have ever pictured him.
Cupid, the wandering archer, full of guile.
She loves him? Aye. But free from fault are they;

Wholly, devotedly he loves Gudrun.

She loves him? Aye. But hopeless is her love;
E'en like mine own. Would that we ne'er had met,
Fair Brynhild, that I ne'er had heard thy name!"

H

Thus Gunter with himself communed: his dream Vanished as vanishes, by a prickle pierced, The iridescent bubble in the air.

XII

HAGEN AND GISELHER

T

"Here let us sit, beneath this ancient elm Which once more, at the magic touch of spring, Bursts into bloom. Something upon my mind Lies which I fain would tell to thee alone."

H

Thus Hagen, o'er the April meadows green Roaming with Giselher, the king's brother, spoke. Then, as themselves they seated, he went on.

III

"Know that last eve, when sunset dyed the sky, I, wandering near the garden of the queen, Heard voices, or, to be more accurate, A woman's voice and, nearer to the spot Drawing, beheld King Gunter and his spouse, Brynhild the valkyr. He in silence stood; Vehement her utterance. Much against my will Was it, like some low eavesdropper, to list: But from the place I could not then escape, And forced was I to hear. This, then, the gist Of Brynhild's wild tirade,—That she, in truth, Loved Gunter not a whit, nor ever had, But only Sigurd. Scarcely could my ears Believe the words. Thy brother, like a man Stabbed to the heart, with face white as a ghost, Listened in silence, then, some broken words Muttering, passed like a shadow from the spot. My heart wept for him. But the valkyr stood, Wrapped in her gloom, a statue motionless; And afterward upon the garden bench Sitting remained till long into the night. Perchance she waited Sigurd there? Who knows?"

147

IV

"What thinkst thou, Hagen, is't an olden flame Long smoldering and now bursting through its bounds,

Or is it something new, this love betwixt Queen Brynhild and the Norseman?" Giselher thus. V

To whom then Hagen: "I know not. Methinks, However, that upon the selfsame day Of their first meeting the amour began. False was he to the king—false to Gudrun. No word of mine this accusation gross Hath hinted until now but, ne'ertheless, Ever within my breast suspicion dwelt And would not down, and now the traitress lips Of Brynhild have themselves proclaimed the worst. This will I tell thee which I never told The king, thy brother. When in Helgoland We landed, up the cliff precipitous Which led to Brynhild's bower enchanted I, Being of body bulky, could not climb, And on the sandy beach was forced to wait, Impatiently, the upshot of the attempt. The meeting on the mountain top, therefore, I saw not, nor have I, from then till now, From lips of either Sigurd or the queen, Learned aught about it, though the livelong day, From morn till eve, they passed together. This (Perchance 'twas wrong) I never told the king, Fearing his deep displeasure, though, methinks, Sigurd he wholly trusted until now."

VI

"Belike the Norseman's blood alone will quench Gunter's deep thirst for vengeance? What thinkst thou?"

Thus Giselher, and to him Hagen replied.

VII

"Would it were so! This Sigurd I love not.

If he hath been disloyal to his king,
Thy brother, and disloyal to his bride,
Thy sister, then methinks his faithless life
Were better ended. Yet I fear the trust
Of Gunter in his friend, so absolute,
May, e'en against the damning evidence,
Unshaken stand. This, then, shall be our task—
To see to it that Gunter falters not
In wreaking vengeance on the outlander;
But if he weakly hesitate (his faith
In Sigurd, spite of all appearances
Avowing) then ourselves to strike the blow,
For the king's honor, and for Burgundy!"

VIII

Thus Hagen, with indignant gesture, spoke, Feigning the old retainer's loyal rage,

And to his eyes the light of cruel hate Leaped, as he spoke, like a malignant flame Rising from out the realms of the accurst, Seen for an instant, and then falling back Into that dread abyss where evil dwells.

IX

And Giselher answered, "Aye, thou speakest well."
Gunter unlike was he, Gernot unlike.
For they, the eldest brother and the third,
Looked not for evil, ever holding good
Mankind till proven base. But in the soul
Of Giselher, the swart second son, distrust
Dwelt, and suspicion ever on its guard,
Doubt of all things in heaven and earth. For he,
Looking within his own heart, guile beheld,
And seeing it thus guileful and of trust
Unworthy, deemed all others like himself.

X

Then from their seat beneath the ancient elm Arose these twain and o'er the meadows green Passed like a brace of vultures who, far off, Scent, with a loathsome glee, the field of blood.

XIII

HAGEN'S SOLILOQUY

Ι

"Had I the Niblung's Ring what wealth were mine!

What power illimitable, for wealth is power,
And glittering gold the monarch of this world!
Would, therefore, that Andvari's Hoard were mine!
Not that soft luxury, or sweet delights
Of love I crave, or state magnificent—
Palace and park and garden such as those
With which the Roman doth surround himself.
These tempt not my stern soul. 'Tis power alone
I covet, not its pomps and vanities.
Mine be the cold gray steel which wins the fight,
Not the triumphal pageant afterward.

II

"When Sigurd dies, and die ere long he shall, I'll seize from off his hand the Niblung's Ring, The golden serpent with two ruby eyes,

The magic talisman which doth rule the Hoard.

What wealth, what power, what joy will then be mine!"

III

Thus did the envious Hagen with his soul Commune, and in bright dreams himself beheld Possessor of the Niblung's wondrous Hoard.

XIV ERDA'S PROPHECY

Ι

Now Sigurd, by forebodings vague depressed,— For o'er his hero-soul impending doom Already cast its shadow,—rose by night And, from the homes of men far wandering, sought, Within her cave upon the mountainside, Erda, the prophetess, that from her lips Inspired his lot predestined he might learn. Like Delphi's holy pythoness was she, Who, sitting on the tripod, did receive The oracles of the Olympian god; Save that with Erda did commune no god, Olympian nor Valhallan, but instead Priestess she was of that pale trinity Who dwell above the gods, outside of time, Whose will is fate immutable and who, Beholding the beginning and the end, Foreknow the lot of each created thing: The Norns—the mystic sisters three—who sit

Ever beside the ash-tree Ygdrasil, Impassive, clothed in white, rose-garlanded, Singing of days gone by and days to come, Spinning the thread of destiny—'twas they Who through the lips of Erda spake to men.

H

Vault-like upon the mountainside the cave Of Erda opened: here, at midnight, came Sigurd and, kneeling in the entrance, thus Addressed the priestess of the mystic Norns.

Ш

"Erda, thou holy one, to whom all things
In heaven and earth are known, to whom the Past,
The Present and the Future are as one,
(For hast thou not been chosen by the Norns
Their vicar here below?) thee I beseech
To grant me now foreknowledge of the fate
Which doth await me. By misgivings vague
Depressed, my spirit fain would hear thy voice.
Far wandering from the haunts of men by night
My feet have sought thy sanctuary. What ill
Knocks at my door? Is it some peril weird,
Such as in days gone by my soul hath faced

Unshrinking, nay, with a wild joy? Or is't
The inevitable hour which comes to all?
The stroke of doom? The thing which men call death.

Hear me, thou holy one, and grant my prayer!"

IV

He ceased and on the cavern's floor remained, Kneeling, all motionless. Then far within The sanctuary a light celestial dawned And, in its midst, before the warrior's eyes, Appeared, like goddess by an aureole bright Enveloped, Erda. Beautiful her face But sad; black as the raven's wing her hair; Her mien majestic; her tall figure robed In samite white, with golden cincture girt. As in all ages of the world hath been The sibyl's mystic answer, (that of her Of Samos, who the Trojan war foretold; Or her of Cumæ, whom Æneas sought, Foreteller of the rise and fall of Rome) E'en such was Erda's now, as she foretold The death of Sigurd, and to him declared The future glories of the Scandian race; E'en such was Erda's answer now :-- A voice

Prophetic echoing in the halls of time:
A message from the realms beyond the veil;
Immortal purposes to mortal man
Revealed. Thus, then, the mystic sibyl spoke.

v

"Sigurd, thy earthly end draws near; ere rise
The suns of many days above the Rhine,
Upborne to high Valhalla wilt thou be
By valkyrs fair—a warrior's obsequies.
Sigmund, thy father, and thy mother, sweet
Siglinda, there await thee; and Gudrun,
Thy wife beloved, soon will thee rejoin.
Thus, sitting by the ash-tree, speak the Norns."

νi

A space the sibyl paused, and then went on.

VII

"Aye, Sigurd, thou must die; but glory waits Thy race. Into the world's arena now, Fresh from his eyrie in the Scandian hills, Descends the Northman. His the mind robust, Clear as the wind-swept sky; the body his At home with Nature, whatsoe'er her mood, To sun and storm, to cold and heat inured.

Born on the mountains, on the ocean bred,
He knows not luxury's all-encumbering chains —
Silken without, but links of steel beneath.
Fain, like the eagle, would he roam for aye,
And toward the Southland his adventurous flight
He turns. There Rome aweary sits. Her heart
No more ambition fires: no more her brain
Plans conquests vast; her erstwhile puissant arm
Droops by her side, and all unheeded hangs
That sword the godlike Julius once did wield.
Years weigh her Titan spirit down, for states,
Like men, grow old, and with Rome's years have come

Vast riches, ease luxurious, the command
Of all things upon earth. Is't strange her sons,
Once rugged, now degenerate grown, esteem
As useless toil the storm and stress of war?
New blood the world doth need, for the world's work
Strong hands, stout hearts demands, and he who rules

This world, the wise All-Father, and doth see
Each century's wants, hath picked from the far north Rome's heir. The Norseman takes the Roman's place.

The sceptre to a younger race descends,
Though masterful as were the men of Rome.
Behold! As flow the torrents from the hills,
What time bright Spring unlocks the winter's clasp,
So from their Scandian homes, unceasing, flow
The hardy Northmen o'er the Roman lands
And, like a vivifying flood, restore
Youth to a world effete. They come! They come!
Out of the dark northeast, from Sweden's shores,
From Norway's flords, from Denmark's wind-swept dunes,

One people called by many names, one race
Of ocean-warriors, golden-haired they come!
Methinks as in a dream I see them now.
With tossing prows far out at sea beheld,
With spears and helmets through the ocean mists
Flashing, they come; unheralded; with dread
Watched by those spirits pusillanimous
Whose purblind eyes see not in these fierce foes
Heaven's chosen seed, the saviours of the land.
Wild giants they, wet with the salt sea-foam,
But in their lives the primal virtues shine—
Strength, courage, justice, boundless energy,
Truth-telling, love of home, contempt of death,
High wisdom, and all else that makes the man—

And through them is old Europe born again.

As comes the spring-time back to earth, so comes
Once more the age heroic back to men.
The figure of a Norseman, spear in hand,
Crown'd with his wingèd helmet, eagle-like
Roaming, in dragon-ship, the ocean, looms
Above the world's horizon: I behold,
Comrades in fame, thy vikings range themselves
Beside the stalwart shapes that founded Rome,
And hero-hosts Hellenic; and in thee,
Sigurd, though briefer was thy life than theirs,
Ulysses and Æneas live again.

VIII

"But see! E'en now, on Britain's stormy shores,
Hengist and Horsa, with their sea-tost hosts,
Land, and great England, Rome's predestined
heir,

Begins her conquering march. As, in a gale, A mighty tidal wave, holp by the winds, Breaks on some isle, and overwhelms the land, All things submerging; so, on Britain's isle, The viking tide, in waves successive, breaks, And overflows the land; o'erflows save where, In west and north, the mountain fastnesses

Of Wales and Caledonia lift their towers.

Angles, Jutes, Saxons, Norsemen, Swedes, Goths, Danes,

One people called by many names, one race Of ocean-warriors, golden-haired, they come.

A thousand years before me stretch—I see

The wild beginnings of a nation; all

The ferment which precedes the ordered state:

The clash of rival clans: the jars and wars

Of petty kingdoms, jealous of their rights:

The inevitable struggles manifold

Which leave the fittest master. I behold

Strong kings contending for the land: the hosts

Of Arthur against Saxon Cerdic hurled:

The life-long wars of Alfred with the Danes:

The battle fierce of Brunanburgh, where strove

From morn till night, Olaf and Athelstan:

The victories of the great Canute: and last,

The triumph epochal, on Senlac Hill,

Of Norman William, greatest of them all.

Scion of Rollo's ocean-cradled race.

I see, slow-rising through the years, like tower

Broad-based with glittering tops which seek the sky.

England, a realm by sea-kings' swords upbuilt.

If thou wouldst know the soul of this fair isle, The well-spring of her spirit bright, behold, In the far north, the sources of her life! Thy north, my Sigurd! See the choicest sons Of those gray coasts begirt by boreal sea, Their mother-lands forsaking, give their strength, Bequeath their spirits venturesome and brave, To England, in whose veins, compounded, live Angle, Jute, Saxon, Norman, Swede and Dane. Ave, of the North's best blood is England born! A valkyr beautiful, methinks, she stands, Leaning upon her spear; her golden locks Crown'd by the wingèd helmet—Odin's child! In her the viking spirit lives for aye! In her wild Scandia flowers! Thy soul and hers, Sigurd, are one! By her thy youthful dream, To wander like some great-wing'd ocean-bird, Petrel or gull or tireless albatross, Ever and ever upon the dark blue sea — By her this viking dream, though lost to thee, Shall be fulfilled! In her thy race shall rise To heights majestic, and men now unborn, Back looking through the centuries, shall behold, In history's sky, great England shining bright (Twin orbs of light) beside imperial Rome!"

IX

The sibyl ceased, and though for further speech Sigurd, with eager utterance, her besought, She disappeared within the cavern's depths.

XV

THE DEATH OF SIGURD

Ι

Beyond the Rhine, east of its silvery stream,
Between the Neckar and the Main outstretched,
A mighty forest lies—the Odenwald.
Leagues north and south, leagues east and west extends

This ancient wood, upon the sloping sides
Of mountains lifted, or outspread in vales
Innumerable. A rugged tract it is
Of primal forest rooted in the rocks
Of earlier ages: a vast wilderness
Of woods and peaks, deep glens and sunny glades,
Of grass-grown summits and pellucid streams.
Here range at will the creatures of the wild—
The bear, the wolf, the deer, the fox, the boar.
Here, them to slaughter, man, the hunter, comes.

II

What time the summer morn in beauty breaks, And sing the early birds from many a bough, 164

Rose Sigurd from his couch beside Gudrun,
And for the chase began to make prepare.
For he, that day, deep in the Odenwald
Would hunt, with Hagen and the brothers twain,
Gernot and Giselher. So betimes he rose.

III

Now as, accoutered for the chase, he stood Within their chamber, suddenly to his side, A wave of radiant beauty, swept Gudrun, And round his puissant shoulders her white arms Threw, and her lily face, so passing fair, To him uplifted, and, with troubled voice Beseeching him, tears in her eyes, thus spoke.

IV

"O go not to the chase to-day! Last night Dread dreams affrighted me. I saw thee fall, Deep in the Odenwald, by two fierce boars Assailed. Thee on the sward lifeless I saw, Thy heart's blood dyeing red the forest's green. O go not to the chase, to-day, dear lord! Something knocks at the portals of my life And tells me I shall never see thee more!"

V

So saying, on her husband's breast she laid Her golden head, and wept, and tightly wound About his neck her alabastrine arms.

VI

Then Sigurd thus: "Something me also warns. Something doth tell me evil lurks ahead. But if 'tis fate's decree that I should die. If 'tis permitted by the mighty Norns, What use for me, the creature of a day, To seek to avert the blow, to dodge my doom? What comes will come. None can his weird escape. And who can tell? Perchance my mood is naught — A passing cloudlet which upon my soul, But for a moment, doth its shadow cast? Perchance thy dream nothing doth signify? If so, why like a coward should I shrink From fancied perils? Better 'tis to live Free from the bonds of fear, and when the time Comes to depart, as fearlessly to go, Than of that last, inevitable hour Always to stand in dread. Better it is To die once only, not a thousand times. Nay, dearest, let us put aside thy dreams,

My sad forebodings. See! The summer sun Bathes all the landscape, and the beauteous Rhine Winds like a golden road beneath its light! Soon o'er those waters swift we'll make our way, And then, ho! for the merry greenwood tree!"

VII

He ceased and, clasping close between his hands Her lily face, kissed tenderly and oft, As is the wont of lovers, those sweet lips, Now tremulous with sad solicitude. Then to the spacious palace grounds the twain Descended, she ave clinging to his side, (Her heart in secret weeping,) and there found Gernot and Giselher, and the gloomy knight. Hagen, accoutered all for the day's chase. Gunter alone was absent, state affairs His excusation, but his haughty queen Showed at her casement like a dark-stoled nun Gazing upon some scene of revelry. And when their fast they'd broken and good-byes Said the impatient sportsmen toward the Rhine Strode off, and soon were rowed across its stream. Steeds them awaited on the other side. And hounds and huntsmen at the Odenwald.

VIII

Now when, at last, the great plain of the Rhine
Was left behind them, and the forest's depths
They entered, gay the scene which met their eyes.
Here was the meet: here many a gallant hound
Impatient waited, many a forester
In wood-craft wise. Then spoke, with gestures droll,

A grizzly-bearded huntsman: this his tale. He in the wood had harbored a wild boar, An ancient solitary. Back and forth, From feed to lair, from lair to feed again, With help of hound sagacious, sure of scent, He'd slotted him. A monster huge he was, Vast as a bear, with tusks most terrible, Fierce as the ancient sanglier ever is. "Aye, even as I slotted him he turned," So quoth the graybeard forester, "and drove Me and my limehound from his leafy lair. But safely is he harbored now, and I Can put the hounds upon him easily."

IX

Then gayly Giselher wound his hunting horn, And straightway he and Hagen to the spot Rode where the ancient sanglier lay concealed,
And with them went the huntsmen and the hounds:
And to a sunny glade some distance off
Rode Sigurd and young Gernot, there to wait
The boar when he broke covert: and ere long
Came to their ears, borne down the wind, a blast
Triumphal, through the greenwood echoing shrill—
The horn of Hagen, telling that the hounds
Had roused their quarry and the hunt was on.

X

Now toward the open space where Sigurd sat
And Gernot on their steeds the distant cry
Seemed moving and with ready spear the twain
Waited expectant. Nearer came the cry.
Then suddenly they beheld, far down the glade,
Swift running as a race-horse toward his goal,
The ancient solitary who, in a trice,
Turned and within the greenwood disappeared.
Too thick for horse the tangled forest here;
And Sigurd, from his steed dismounting, bound
Bridle to tree and, winding his great horn
For signal, plunged on foot into the wood.
Gernot him followed; and the dark-browed knight,
Hagen, soon coming up, with Giselher, both

Quickly discarded horse and sought on foot To pierce the tangled thickets of the wood— By baying hounds preceded and a throng Of huntsmen followed, hurrying at their heels

ΧI

But well the ancient solitary ran—
Swiftly and wisely—and right valiantly
He fought too, when occasion called, that day.
For thrice, when brought to bay by furious hounds,
He charged on his pursuers and or slew
Or maimed them, and three times he got away,
And the third time he made good his escape
And, all unspeared, with spirit stout, regained
His haunts beneath the merry greenwood tree.

XII

And in the afternoon to a deep glen
Through which, with soothing purl, a brooklet ran,
Came Sigurd, wearied with the fruitless chase,
And wandering through the interminable wood.
And up against a linden tree his spear
He leaned, and for a pillow took his cloak,
And on the green moss of the wood lay down.
And, though against his will, soft-fingered sleep
Soon closed his eyes. So wearied out was he.

XIII

And while he slept came also to the glen (By cruel fate inexorable led)
Hagen and Giselher and, with startled eyes,
Beheld their quarry. Thus then Hagen spoke:

XIV

"Lost is the boar, but nobler game is here!
Behold the son of Sigmund where he lies
All unaccoutered, forage for our spears!
What sayst thou, shall we slay him as he sleeps?"

XV

Then Giselher: "I have heard that sharpest steel Pierces him not: that by the dragon's blood Invulnerable made, he laughs at spears."

XVI

To him then Hagen. "Aye, the tale is true. When the black blood of Fafnir covered him, What time he crouched within the narrow pit And, with an upward thrust, the dragon's hide Pierced, and his sword went onward to the heart, Forthwith invulnerable he became. Yet, ne'ertheless, I'll wager my good spear, Dragvandil, could right quickly finish him.

However, to our story let's return. One spot alone is human. In one place Only can enter the death-dealing dart. Betwixt his shoulders had a linden leaf Fallen, while in the narrow pit he stood, Waiting, and when the blood of Fafnir bathed Head, limbs and trunk, the spot where lay the leaf, Alone of all his frame, remained untouched. This from Gudrun, in confidence, I heard: Who on his kirtle hath a linden leaf. Masked in a quaint design of branch and twig, Embroidered, covering the spot exact; She in her innocence beseeching me To guard that spot as it were my own heart. Thus foolish, Giselher, are all womankind. But let us to our task. Ha! He awakes."

XVII

"Ho! Hagen! Giselher! You here? Have I slept?"

Thus Sigurd, rising from his mossy couch.

"An empty chase we've had, in truth! Right well
Our foe, the ancient sanglier, played his game.
But see how cool you rivulet which runs
Adown the dusky glen! How crystal clear

It sparkles! Like a merry mountain nymph Methinks it is, and like her laughter gay Its rippling voice doth call me. Thirsty am I, And from those waters sweet fain would I drink."

XVIII

So saying, toward the brook he strode and knelt
Upon its sandy border with intent
To quaff from the cool wave unmeasured draughts;
Which seeing, Hagen, with a stealthy step
(While Giselher stood a partner to the deed)
Came up behind and, lifting high in air
His spear, and crying, "Strike home, Dragvandil!"
drave

Betwixt his victim's shoulders the bright steel.

Swift through the broidered linden leaf it made
Its fatal way, seeking the hero's heart.

Alas! What grievous wound hath Sigurd now?

No word he uttered, only a deep groan
Of purest anguish, as upon the sand,
Bleeding, he sank. Then straight his spirit rose
From that rent body to Valhalla's halls.

So, by the hand of murderer base—a deed
Savage and senseless, born of envy—died
The son of Sigmund, noblest of mankind.

XIX

Now as beside the rivulet the corse
Of Sigurd lay, all bathed in precious blood,
Into that place of death young Gernot came.
He, like the others, through the wood had sought,
Vainly, the ancient sanglier, and this glen
Chancing upon he entered and beheld,
At first with eyes which comprehended not,
The corse of Sigurd and, standing near by,
Grasping within his hand a blood-stained spear,
The giant form of Hagen. Demon like
The murderer gazed upon his victim. Then
Flashed on the soul of Gernot the dread truth,
And, striding toward the dark-browed knight, he raised

His spear as if to strike him. "Devil!" he cried, "What hast thou done?" But flinched the other not.

"The false seducer of thy brother's wife
I slew." Thus Hagen. "Fitter had it been
If thou, thyself, had done it, but the deed
On me devolved." "Thou liest!" Gernot cried,
"I know the wretched tale. Baseless it is.
And minded am I at this minute to strike
Thee dead beside thy victim. But what good?

Sigurd is gone. His light hath left this world.

And though a thousand Hagens spilled their blood,

It would not bring him back again. Alas! Alas! That such a dastard deed Should be permitted by the righteous heavens!"

XX

He ceased and, by the body of his friend
Kneeling, to staunch the crimson current strove;
Then bathed with water from the brook the face
And hands of the pale corse (still warm with life
But growing cold in death) and o'er the face
Spread gently a blue cloak, and laid the limbs
Orderly, and in every manner sought
To make less terrible the ghastly sight.
While to the dead these gentle offices
He tendered, with a soft as woman's touch,
Tears uncontrollable suffused his eyes.
But ruthless stood the two conspirators.
Cold as those others who, in Roman halls,
(What time their hands had dragged the eagle down)

Watched, all unmoved, the murdered Julius die.

XXI

Now from the wood the sounds of hunting horns,
Nearer approaching, came; and Giselher, them
Noting, a blast responsive blew, and soon
Appeared within the dusky glen a group
Of huntsmen, glad their masters to rejoin.
To whom then Giselher thus: "A dreadful thing,
My men, hath happened. Through the forest's depths

Seeking the solitary boar, we three, My brother Gernot, Hagen and myself, Chanced on this gloomy glen, and here, beside Yon streamlet lying, as ye see him now, Earl Sigurd found. Covered he was with blood, Which from a great wound in his body flowed. Almost his breath had ceased. Quickly we strove To staunch the crimson current and to bring His spirit back to earth. But 'twas in vain. Methinks the boar, catching him unawares, Hath charged upon him and its mighty tusks Driven into his heart. Perchance he slept, O'ercome by the long chase, and in his sleep The sanglier found and slew him. Who can tell? One duty have we now. One thing alone Remains to do. To bear the pallid corse

Back to his wife—our sister. From this wood Our arms shall sadly carry him, and thence A wain shall bear his body to the Rhine."

XXII

So to the foresters the second son

Of old King Dancrat spake, with solemn mien

Dexterously dissembling; and forthwith

A litter of stout beechen boughs they made,

And on it placed, wrapped in his cloak of blue,

The corse of Sigurd, and two foresters,

One at his head, one at his feet, him bore

From out the wood, preceded by the rest

Marching with mournful tread, and followed slow

By the two royal brothers and that knight

Whose name henceforth, through cycles long of time,

The stain of this base murder was to bear.

XVI

BESIDE THE RHINE

Ι

Now on the banks of Rhine a funeral pyre

Did Sigurd's vikings rear, and on it placed —

Robed in rich garb, and wearing wingèd helm

And byrnie bright, as if for battle drest —

The body of their chief; and by his side

His sword they would have laid, that wondrous brand

Which Odin from Valhalla's halls had brought To Volsing's son and later Regin's skill, Welding the mystic shards, had forged anew; But them Gudrun besought with flowing tears To grant it her, last relic of her lord; So into her fair hands was Gram bestowed.

 Π

For when the pyre was ready and from out Gudrun's dark bower the silent Scandians bore The corse of Sigurd Jarl, them close behind, A black-veiled, faltering figure, came Gudrun, 178

Followed by weeping damsels of her bower. And came also unto the banks of Rhine The king, begirt with knights; and the pale queen. Brynhild, the valkyr, by her damosels Attended; and the brothers of the king, Giselher and Gernot; and that warrior grim, Hagen yclept, of evil all compact, The ruthless instrument of cruel fate. And likewise came a motley multitude Of divers sorts, soldiers and citizens. Rough farmers with their wives and progeny, And lads and lassies in life's April still, All flocking to the banks of Father Rhine, There to behold the Norseman's obsequies. And when beside the flood his vikings laid Their chieftain's body, ere upon the pyre They placed it and the funeral flame applied, Forth glided from among her maids Gudrun, And by the bier, like a swift-moving wraith, Sank down, and round the lifeless body claspt Her beauteous arms, as if she wildly sought To summon back, by love importunate, Into that broken vessel cold, erstwhile Its dwelling place, her lord's departed ghost. And thus, beside the bier, burst forth Gudrun.

III

"Dark, dark my life! What now to me is earth? What now the beauteous Rhine, upon whose banks While love sang in the tree-tops, once we walked? Thrice poignant is my pain as on each spot Made sacred by our happiness I gaze! Here once was mine joy inexpressible! Here now, alas, with anguish bleeds my heart! Woe lays on me his heavy hand and Grief Invests my spirit with his inky pall.

Gone, gone my love! Gone, gone earth's noblest soul!

Fair font from which life-giving draughts I drank!

Gone are those eyes which lit for me the world!

That voice whose music did my heart enthrall!

Those lips from which sweet sustenance I drew!

Gone is my mate—within whose arms was heaven—

My other half. For like a noble tree

We grew, one substance, till an angry bolt

Of lightning rent our wedded life in twain;

And on the ground he lies, blackened and dead,

And I, the other half, live on alone,

Yet scarcely live, a mutilated shape,

Standing upon the melancholy wold,

To bear my cruel scars until the end."

IV

She ceased and, kneeling still beside the bier, Kissed o'er and o'er again the lifeless lips
Of that which was her loving husband once—
The pallid clay where once the spirit dwelt.
Then on his bosom, weeping, bowed her head.
And o'er the bier her tresses, loosed in woe,
Swept like a golden coverlet to the ground.

V

Then from the Norsemen's midst a figure tall
Of noble aspect, helmeted, and drest
In raiment rich, befitting his high rank,
Strode slowly forth, and stood before the king —
Hakon the son of Halfdan, of the Bear
The captain, and the warrior upon whom,
Earl Sigurd being dead, command devolved.
And thus, while on his every accent hung
The vast assemblage, Gunter he addressed.

VI

"Sad are our hearts, O King! Us have the Norns A blow o'erpowering dealt. And though, like men, We strive to bear the buffetings of Fate, Yet like this weeping widow's is our woe. Sigurd is dead! Slain is the blameless one!

The noble son of Sigmund is no more!

The flower of all the North has passed away!

VII

"Strange doth it seem to us who knew him well
That he could have an enemy, that in all
This world of men lived one who loved him not.
And yet it must be so. His gaping wound
Promulgates unto all the dreadful truth.
Foul murder hath been done. By hand of man
He fell, and not by tusk of the wild boar.
By dastard spear and not in honest strife.
But to the perpetrator of this crime
We hold no clue. If 'twere not so, if we Could name the assassin, swiftly should his blood
Atonement make; e'en though each one of us
Thereafter died, all falling where we fought.

VIII

"Yet thee, King Gunter, do we guiltless hold; Knowing that thou didst love him like ourselves; Knowing that on thy spirit sorrow sits, As on the souls of each of us, a bird Gigantic, shutting out the air and light; Knowing that thou wilt mourn him till the end.

IX

"Farewell! When we to his beloved corse
Have paid our final homage, and the rites
Ordained by the Immortals have performed,
And in the flame hath vanished his dear clay,
Down the swift Rhine, from out thy realm, O King,
We'll pass, and thou shalt see us never more.
Back to our Northland ocean-haunted, back
To that gray Scandia whence we came, we'll go.
Aye, homesick is my heart! Farewell, farewell!"

X

He ceased and, from the presence of the king Withdrawing, joined once more his mariners, Bidding them place the body on the pyre. Then was it that Gudrun the chief besought To grant her Gram, last relic of her lord, That wondrous brand which Odin once had grasped. So into her fair hands was Gram bestowed.

XI

Now when upon the lofty pyre was laid The corse of Sigurd, ere the funeral flame, Which changeth clay to ashes, had been lit, Forth from her ladies came, with stately step, (While wonderment the vast assemblage held) Brynhild the valkyr, Gunter's haughty queen, And standing by the fateful pyre thus spoke:

XII

"Hakon, thy words are wise. Like thine my heart Homesick doth languish. As an eagle caged Doth ever of the boundless mountains dream, So dream I ever of my valkyr days.

Life here to me is naught: aye, worse than naught As to that captive eagle, though his cage Be golden, death doth come as a release, So to my soul comes death a sweet release.

When, freed from earthly bonds, my happy ghost Hath risen to Valhalla, there these eyes My father Odin shall behold once more.

There waits he me. There, as in bygone days, His loving arms shall fold me to his breast.

My fault forgiven. Expiation done."

XIII

She ceased and, with uplifted countenance, Gazed at the heavens for a little space, As though her eyes beheld, in that blue dome, The figure of her father, Odin great, Standing as in the lonely isle he stood,
What time with waving spear and magic rune
(While in his heart reigned grief ineffable)
He wove the spell about her and the flames
Commanded to protect her from all harm.
Thus for a little time the valkyr stood.
Then, while the multitude looked on with awe,
And in amaze stood Gunter and his court,
The lofty pyre she mounted and, beside
The corse of Sigurd kneeling, swiftly drove
A diamond-hilted dagger to her heart.

XIV

Thus passed from earth into Valhallan air Brynhild, that daughter whom the god supreme Above all others loved. A glorious soul Clothed in the beauty of the starry night.

χV

And side by side upon the lofty pyre
This noble twain the bearded Norsemen laid —
Sigurd and Brynhild; and Earl Hakon bade
The logs be lighted, and a mighty flame,
Fanned by the wind, sprang up, and in the flame
Swiftly their mortal bodies were consumed.

